THE RESULTS of the February election, the biggest democratic exercise known to history, have exceeded the fondest expectations of opposition parties. The Kerala Communists alone had seemed to be sure of capturing power. On the eve of the election, differences had weakened the party coalitions in Bengal, Bihar, and Orissa States. Neither the Dravidian Progressive Federation (DPF) in Madras nor the Akali Dal in Punjab was certain of winning absolute majorities. At the national level, opposition leaders were privately admitting that they would be satisfied if the Congress Party's strength in the 521-member Lok Sabha (lower house) was reduced to 300 from 365.

The opposition now controls eight states, with the possibility of another —Rajasthan—coming under their sway in the months ahead because of the ruling party's precarious position in its legislature. The loss of Uttar Pradesh, which came when Congress Party dissidents joined the opposition on a routine vote of confidence as the new state legislature convened on April 1, was a particularly hard blow. The state borders New Delhi, is India's most populous, and as the center of the

ENORMOUS POWER and ANTIQUATED PRACTICES

The power to veto, curtail or delay Congressional action is vested in the Appropriations Committees

By David Cohen

Congressional appropriation procedures need overhauling. Current appropriations practices, adopted nearly a century ago, are clearly unfit and inefficient for the latter part of the 20th century.

The House and Senate Appropriations Committees have acquired enormous power as a result of these antiquated practices—a power so great that even when the Congress legislates for a modern age the Appropriations Committees have the power to veto, curtail or hinder Congressional action.

This power to negate often results in the Appropriations Committees (especially in the House) frustrating the will of the House, the Senate and the President.

To put the appropriations process on a rational basis that serves society's needs requires comprehensive action to achieve long-term and short-term targets. It requires fundamental changes in the institutional practices of both the Legislative and Executive Branches of government. It requires legislative reforms that allow the majority of the majority party to work its will in the Appropriations Committees. It requires democratic procedures that result in the committee chairman being made responsible to the majority of the majority party. It requires the Executive Branch to begin broader, more intensive economic planning.

The power of the Third House of Congress—the Appropriations Committees—is neither fully realized nor well understood. Horror stories abound. Increasingly, it is evident that the 90th Congress will use the annual appropriations requirement to repeal or delay the significant progress made by previous Congresses.

Conservatives and reactionaries on the Appropriations Committees—especially in the House—are leading an onslaught that already threatens effective civil rights enforcement.

Incentives for metropolitan planning (only a $30 million request) are apparently dead for fiscal 1968. After slicing rent supplements to skeleton-size ($10 million of a $40 million request) the conservative-reactionary coalition eliminated even the $10 million on the House floor. Only the most intense efforts by the Administration, the labor movement, and city officials prevented the demise of model cities.

How does the Third House do its wrecking?

Typically, when Congress enacts federal grant-in-aid legislation—such as aid to elementary and secondary education to assist children from low income families—it authorizes funds. In fiscal 1967, $1,433,589,014 was thus authorized, and that fund level established a ceiling.

No more than the authorization may be spent. Moreover, no funds may be spent until the money is appropriated, which requires an entirely separate Congressional action. Congress then has the power, on the second go-round, to appropriate less money, or no money—but not more money—for a specific program.

It often exercises that power. In fiscal 1967 it appropriated only $1,070,410,000 for educating children, thereby prohibiting the expenditure of over $350 million of education funds previously authorized.

Another typical appropriation problem is illustrated by the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

Title VI prohibits the expenditure of federal funds for programs that discriminate on account of race. This ban is not self-executing. Federal employees must be hired to enforce the Congressional mandate, and the 1964 Civil Rights Act specifically authorizes such funds as may be necessary to enforce the law.

But the Appropriations Committee slashed the Administration's requests for personnel. Thus, the Civil Rights Act's prohibition on discrimination remains inadequately enforced. The Congressional mandate was further undermined when the House Appropriations Committee severely chastised federal officials for enforcing the act.

On June 30, fiscal 1967 will end. By then, or shortly thereafter, the Congress will have appropriated approximately $125 billion. But apart from some briefings by the Budget Bureau, neither the House nor the Senate Appropriations Committee studied the total budget. Since Congress disposes of budget recommendations piecemeal, through a dozen or more appropriations bills, it discards the bare mini-priority framework used by the Budget Bureau.

The appropriations process is so ungeared to present-day needs that even on the basis of annual appropriations, existing programs are neither evaluated against existing needs or purposes nor examined systematically. No real attempt is made to relate either present needs to future ones or present federal expenditure effort to present needs.

The result is that old established domestic and military programs—sacred cows of the Appropriations Committees—have little difficulty obtaining the federal dollar while new programs are treated like poor relations.

The immediate challenge to liberals is to develop feasible ways of breaking the stranglehold now held by the Appropriations Committees. Increasingly, this is a high-priority matter, for we will meet our public service needs only with adequate federal funding.

Appropriation bills originate in the House. On controversial issues the point of Congressional origin is of critical importance, so that the House plays a crucial role in determining the final Congressional result.

The House Appropriations Committee's power will not be circumscribed by a frontal assault. Until the Executive Branch engages in planning—determining necessary outlays to meet our needs over a certain number of years—there is no realistic chance of bypassing the gantlet of annual appropriations.

To limit the power of the House Appropriations Committee requires making changes that are far-reaching but are within the framework of the House as an institution. To understand that committee is to learn how its members are chosen, what views they hold, why the subcommittee system is so important, and the role Chairman Mahon (D.-Tex.) plays in committee recommendations.

The political composition of the House Appropriations Committee has special importance. In the 90th Congress the committee consists of 30 Democrats and 21 Republicans but, without regard to party label, the conservatives have a commanding majority.

Democratic members are chosen for this coveted assignment by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, which serves as the 'Committee on Committees' for Democratic House members. The usual practice is to have the membership reflect a geographical distribution that de-emphasizes political viewpoint. The House Democratic Party is overwhelmingly liberal, but liberal Democrats are greatly under-represented on the Appropriations Committee.

In contrast, the House Republicans on the Appropriations Committee represent a majority of the House Republican party. Most House Republicans are arch-conservative and, of its 21 Appropriations members, 18 fit this category.

Since 1963, the House Democratic leadership has elected additional liberals for membership on the committee, but this effort has only reduced the conservative majority. Even in the liberal 89th Congress, the conservatives had a majority.

The subcommittees usually decide the divisive issues. Rarely does the full committee overturn a subcommittee's decision on a major issue.

Under existing practices the committee chairman has absolute power to appoint chairmen and members of subcommittees.

In conflicts between the chairman and the subcommittee chairman, the chairman invariably prevails. Rep. Mahon favors drastic budget cuts in "non-essential" programs. In January, Mahon defined as "non-essentials" the Teacher Corps, model cities, rent supplements and some OEO programs.

Liberal battles that are lost in subcommittee stay lost. The full committee is neither liberal nor likely to oppose its chairman by being more liberal than he. Efforts to change subcommittee bills in the Appropriations Committee are as they are on the House floor: to cut or eliminate new, innovative and socially significant programs.

Once a bill is reported out by the full committee, it is even more difficult to increase funds on high priority domestic programs.

Since 1961, the exceptions are few: in 1963 on an accelerated public works program, and in 1966 on the rent supplement program. Both efforts had the full support of the White House and House Democratic leadership. Even with such support, the struggle is all up-hill.

On controversial matters, House Republicans are obviously not bound by Appropriations Committee decisions. In the non-roll call teller votes, and especially on the motion to recommit (a parliamentary device available to opponents of the bill through which minority party members may exercise first rights) decisions of the Appropriations Committee may be reversed.

If the issue is sufficiently important, and the program has little support within the House Republican Party, the GOP Policy Committee will support severe cuts. Invariably, this kind of move gets the overwhelming support of House Republicans.

On the recent vote to eliminate rent supplements —a goal sought by the Republican Policy Committee —only 12 Republicans, of 187, opposed their party's position.

In the 90th Congress, the Senate has a narrow liberal majority, but the Senate Appropriations Committee does not reflect this majority.

On the Democratic side, conservatives are much over-represented. Republican liberals are reasonably well represented on the Senate Appropriations Committee, but the conservative coalition is in a commanding position when it gains support from some moderates.

If the Democratic Party remains the majority party in the House, it must act responsibly. The large majority of the Democratic Party is liberal, yet, the committee system, especially in Appropriations, stymies efforts to implement the programs the majority supports.

The majority party should no longer be the slave of party ratios on the Appropriations Committee based on the number of Democrats and Republicans in the House. Under an old arrangement between Speaker Rayburn and Minority Leader Martin, party ratios were fixed at 30 for the majority party and 20 for the minority party.

From the 1958 elections until 1964, this represented roughly the Democratic-Republican party ratio. The 1964 Democratic landslide resulted in a readjustment that reflected the actual ratios.

One method to achieve party responsibility would be to assign enough seats on the committee to assure control by a majority of the majority party. This has been accomplished in the Rules Committee by providing for a two-to-one party ratio, and by filling vacancies with liberal members.

Such a policy would give a majority of the majority party, when it is Democratic, a chance to have its views concurred in by a majority of the Appropriations Committee. When Republicans have a House majority, conservatives would obviously have committee control.

Such an adjustment requires a change in the rules at the opening of Congress, and could be achieved only in a liberal Congress. Obviously, conservatives would resist the change, as would those legislators who traditionally support the chairman of the Appropriations Committee. But with strong leadership, such difficulties could be overcome.

One other basic change is essential when the Democrats are in the majority. The Democratic caucus should require all committee chairmen to be responsible to it.

There are several methods of achieving this. The caucus could elect committee chairmen each Congress. Or the Speaker could nominate committee chairmen and the caucus would ratify them. Or the caucus could elect from the three senior members on the committee.

Whatever alternative is chosen, the principle that committee chairmen are responsible to the majority caucus should be established. Such a principle would tend to place constraints on Rep. Mahon's power and on the other committee chairmen who use their power in ways that violate the will of the House Democratic Party's majority.

Permitting the majority party to have twice as many members as the minority party on Appropriations, and making committee chairmen responsible to the caucus would be notable achievements. No real progress can be made until these reforms are obtained.

A basic alteration in the funding procedure is ultimately required for domestic programs. The pattern of chaos in legislative appropriations is more chaotic only in degree than the resource allocation procedures used by the Executive Branch.

Since 1961, the Executive Branch of government has initiated many improvements, but the salient fact remains: the Budget Bureau is institutionally incapable of planning the nation's priority needs.

The Executive Branch needs to be organized so that it can plan adequately for the complex needs of our society. It must establish goals and priorities geared to meeting our requirements for policies in employment, income and public services. It must set target dates to meet these priorities.

Until that is done, we can expect Congress to insist on annual appropriations, with all its uncertainties. Until the Executive Branch engages in full-scale economic planning Congress will rigidly insist on all of its appropriation prerogatives.

An examination of the nation's known needs in housing for low- and moderate-income families and in other public facilities reveals the non-planning process that runs through the Executive Branch and, by necessity, Congress.

A large housing production gap exists. Overall housing production has been about 60 percent of what is needed.

Our tremendous national needs for housing and public facilities dramatize the urgency of planning and acting. Nevertheless, the Executive Branch has failed to develop and articulate the means of meeting these needs with selected target dates.

Until it does so, the Congress will remain singularly unresponsive to the nation's overall needs, and the appropriations procedure will remain a hindrance rather than a help.

On some programs, the Executive Branch has supported new departures. President Johnson's Education Message on Feb. 28, 1967, pointed to the need for "a better education timetable," so that education funds would be appropriated sufficiently early to enable schools and colleges to plan effectively. At least the pertinence of time scheduling and certainty of funding has been articulated.

In seeking a $400 million appropriation for model cities for fiscal 1968, the Administration was merely asking for funds that Congress had already authorized. The Administration believed, on the basis of the demand generated within cities, large and small, for model cities funds, that all $400 million could be efficiently allocated within fiscal 1968, but not all the monies could be efficiently spent.

The Administration sought the full authorization to assure the participating communities that as planned programs began, the funds would be available. Assurance that funds will be available once programs are underway is vital to the model cities concept.

Citizen participation is a requirement in the planning and operation of model cities programs. Inevitably, such a program results in raising the aspirations and expectations of citizens in a model city. If funds are uncertain, discouragement costs the program its momentum and may even defeat it.

The techniques for funding urban, education, employment and other vital social programs outside the annual appropriations process are well known to legislators, but having been used so sparingly, they are hardly known to the general public. One method is to permit authorizations to be spent from debt receipts—authority for the Treasury to use borrowed money or for the activity itself to borrow from the public.

Another method is to use contract authorizations—authority to incur obligations before the money is appropriated. These techniques will remain unused until the Congress believes that a compelling need and political demand exist for their use.

Essential long-term change must be initiated by the Executive Branch. As part of its policy, and in its public expressions, the Executive Branch needs to relate its social programs to an overall scheme of priorities that considers how fast they must be implemented and what size the federal outlays should be.

At present, federal programs are discussed in a vacuum. Although the Executive Branch has made a small start in emphasizing certain programs, its approach remains piecemeal and lacks an overall strategy. It has failed to relate time schedules to resource allocations.

The dramatic growth of American society has multiplied our needs and our problems. The needs cannot be met, nor the problems solved, with antiquated governmental machinery. Both Congress and the Executive Branch must move effectively to modernize their procedures for a modern society.

The House and Its Self-Imposed Gag

By NORMAN C. MILLER

WASHINGTON—The House of Representatives is largely composed of cowardly and incompetent boobs who can't be trusted to vote responsibly on major issues.

Stripped of smooth-sounding verbiage, that is an accurate summary of reasons House leaders give for repeatedly invoking procedural restrictions that prohibit the amendment of important legislation once it reaches the House floor. These "closed rules" leave the general membership helpless to do anything except vote a bill up or down, no matter how objectionable a majority might find parts of a package a committee has put together. Significantly, however, the members do not rebel against their helplessness.

Traditionally, the closed rule is invoked for legislation developed by the Ways and Means Committee, on the ground that it would be folly to expose the complex Internal Revenue code to amendment by all 435 House members. In this session of Congress, however, the no-amendment rule has been extended to legislation allowing lottery selection of draftees and, just last week, to a resolution on Vietnam policy. The first formal expression of House sentiment since the war became the nation's overriding issue was pushed through without allowing attempts to amend it.

Thus, on three of the most important matters of the year, only a relative handful of Congressmen played any effective role in shaping the legislation. And, surprising as it may seem, a large majority of Congressmen voted each time for the gag rules that so seriously eroded their own power. For each time the Rules Committee recommends a no-amendment procedure, the House membership must approve it before the legislation itself is considered.

Ducking Exposure

Cynical politics explains, in large part, why most House members go along with the closed rule. They can duck a lot of embarrassing exposure and specific commitment when there is only an all-or-nothing vote to be cast. And they can loudly proclaim support for a popular but impossible cause like a bust-the-Treasury tax cut when they know there is no risk of having it included in the tax laws.

Republican Rep. Paul Findley of Illinois calls the closed rule an "escape machine" for the House. "In it we can waft dreamily through the stormiest clouds, never get struck by lightning, or even experience the slightest discomfort," he says. "It protects everyone from voting on anything politically sensitive."

Mr. Findley was complaining in this instance about the closed rule that protected the resolution affirming House support for President Nixon's "efforts to negotiate a just peace in Vietnam." He maintained that the broad generalities of the 161-word resolution lacked meaning, and wanted to offer an amendment giving specific endorsement of Nixon troop-withdrawal policy.

Others feared that the seemingly innocuous resolution could have too much meaning, that it could be interpreted by the President as carte blanche support for anything he decided to do in Vietnam. And, indeed, during two days of debate, there were almost as many interpretations of the resolution as there were speakers, making a shambles of the sponsors' argument that amendments would risk confusing the meaning.

The no-amendment rule on the Vietnam resolution provoked an unusually bitter attack on the bipartisan House establishment. "Their desperate effort to avoid debate or examination of the President's policy only indicates their fear of the results of such examination," charged Democratic Rep. Jerome Waldie of California.

"To be limited to a quick and severely restricted yes or no vote regarding the one issue which has completely dominated this nation and its people for more than five years. . . . is blatantly unfair, improper and in the worst possible traditions of governmental and legislative process," complained GOP Rep. Silvio Conte of Massachusetts.

Some hard-line hawks also voted against the no-amendment procedure. "I can see no reason why, on a resolution involving policy as vital as this, that it should be brought to the House floor under a closed rule," said arch-conservative GOP Rep. H. R. Gross of Iowa.

Still, as a prelude to the adoption of the resolution, 333 to 55, the closed rule was approved by a vote of 225 to 132. Indeed, far from rising up against closed rules, the House this year has devised ways of preventing any amendments even when an "open rule" ostensibly allowed them.

This occurred when the House acted in October on the Nixon Administration's bill to allow a draft lottery. Amendments were effectively barred by adoption of a procedure limiting votes to the one-sentence section of the draft law that prohibited lottery selection of draftees. Proposals to amend all other sections of the law—to change draft-deferment rules, for example—were held to be non-germane, and thus out of order.

House leaders defended the no-amendment procedure for the draft bill on pragmatic grounds. The lottery proposal was the only draft-reform idea commanding a broad consensus, they said, and allowing controversial amendments would have risked killing the bill. That risk was real, to be sure, but it wasn't necessarily fatal. After all, the lottery bill subsequently passed the wide-open Senate without amendments, after Senators desirous of more comprehensive reforms were persuaded that it wasn't the right time to press for them.

A Possible Compromise

Of course, the 435-member House needs rules more restrictive than the Senate's, lest it become chaotic. But even in respect to complex tax legislation, the alternative to chaos need not be gag rule. One possible compromise: To allow a limited number of amendments, thus forcing votes on the biggest issues. Or, as some Congressmen have suggested, the membership could at least be permitted to vote yea or nay on each section of a bill such as the comprehensive tax-reform measure, which revises 27 sections of the Internal Revenue Code.

The habit of giving closed rules to all legislation from the Ways and Means Committee forecloses floor amendments on many other matters besides taxes. Tariff bills are protected, too. So are Social Security bills that cover a wide range of Government social policy—including Medicare, Medicaid and welfare as well as old-age benefits and payroll taxes.

Yet most Congressmen seem content to be cut out of the action on all the sensitive issues handled by the Ways and Means Committee. Their sentiment was expressed by Democratic Rep. Thomas O'Neill of Massachusetts when a closed rule for the tax-reform bill was being debated in August.

The veteran Rules Committee member opened by indignantly attacking the Ways and Means reforms as inadequate and wound up arguing against allowing amendments to improve matters. "If we ever have an open rule on this bill, you will be here not only to Christmas but the year after Christmas and probably beyond," he declaimed. "Furthermore, we would be deluged with vans bringing in all the lobbyists from all over the United States who were working on this legislation."

The result, said old hand O'Neill, would be inevitable: "All of the interests in the House would join together to eliminate even these minor (tax reform) improvements and we would wind up with nothing. . . give this bill an open rule and there would be no bill."

That may be an exaggerated appraisal of the weakness of the House membership. But no majority seems willing to dispute it.

The Fund-Raising Furor Spotlights Problems Many in Congress Face

Income Often Fails to Cover Expenses; but Gifts Raise Tricky Legal, Moral Issues

Profitable Birthday Parties

By JERRY LANDAUER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — Thomas J. Dodd, long-time campaigner against crime, subversion and juvenile delinquency, is quite unintentionally turning the spotlight now on the delicate legal and moral questions involved in financing a Congressional career.

The stocky, white-haired Democratic Senator from Connecticut is accused of diverting to personal use, and evading income taxes on, part of the proceeds from three testimonial dinners held in Connecticut since 1961; it was widely assumed by guests that the purpose was to raise political funds. A fourth, hitherto unpublicized fund-raising reception was held for him here in Washington. All told, the four affairs yielded around $200,000.

Soon the Internal Revenue Service will demand an accounting. And within a month the six-member Senate Ethics Committee will begin hearings to publicize the facts and weigh the disputed charges. Ultimately the committee will examine this larger issue: Is it proper for a politician to accept cash contributions when he isn't a declared, active candidate for office?

A few lawmakers unhesitatingly shout "no." Says New Jersey's Republican Sen. Case: "I feel strongly that both the giving and the receiving of such contributions are thoroughly bad public policy." GOP Sen. Young of North Dakota agrees. "I'm satisfied with what the people are paying me. They never begged me to take this job. I asked for it."

The Majority View

But a majority of legislators regard contributions made outside regular campaign fund-raising channels as perfectly proper, always assuming that the recipient doesn't mortgage his independence to the givers. What's more, many of them are unabashedly accepting such help to meet various political expenses.

GOP Sen. Young of North Dakota agrees. "I'm satisfied with what the people are paying me. They never begged me to take this job. I asked for it."

The Majority View

But a majority of legislators regard contributions made outside regular campaign fund-raising channels as perfectly proper, always assuming that the recipient doesn't mortgage his independence to the givers. What's more, many of them are unabashedly accepting such help to meet various political expenses.

No less a political luminary than Senate GOP Leader Dirksen of Illinois maintains a fund in a special bank account from which he draws $10,000 to $12,000 a year to pay for radio and television broadcasts, ads in various journals and other "exposure"-generating expenses. The generous donors, he explains, give "from the heart," knowing that a politician is always campaigning, 365 days a year; Mrs. Dirksen keeps the special fund's books.

Dozens of others allow wealthy supporters to set up office funds or let lobbyists for business and labor sponsor testimonials, anniversary celebrations, birthday parties and other occasions or excuses for fund-raising not necessarily related to campaign needs—namely, office, entertainment and travel expenses.

In recent weeks, Chairman Morgan of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, a Pennsylvania Democrat, benefited from a $100-a-plate dinner; Democratic Rep. Blatnik of Minnesota from a $25 silver anniversary "salute"; Democratic Rep. Giaimo of Connecticut from a testimonial that netted $35,000; Democratic Rep. Udall of Arizona from a Tucson dinner that yielded slightly less. In each case, the recipient says he will spend the money for political purposes. But some other affairs seem less related to political costs. Friends of Harlem's Democratic Rep. Powell tossed a party to help him pay a $40,000 libel judgment incurred when he hurled the epithet "big-woman" at an innocent New Yorker.

Prime Targets

The standard testimonial fete isn't necessarily a spontaneous outpouring of well-wishers. People for whom a Congressman has performed services tend to become prime targets for invitations. "I've had the bite put on me three times this month already," one Capitol Hill lobbyist grumbles, "but I can't afford not to show up."

The varieties of opinion about political gifts illustrate the Ethics Committee's tricky task and help illuminate the shadowy world of Congressional finances. In that world, regardless of the dictates of morality, it appears that each member is generally legally free to raise and spend money for political purposes as he wishes. There are few guidelines this side of bribery. For that reason, some Senators on the Ethics Committee hesitate to approve or condemn Sen. Dodd's fund-raising.

One of these, Democratic Sen. McCarthy of Minnesota, regrets that the committee didn't have time to develop standards before the Dodd case erupted (it took a year to find six Senators willing to serve). "We shouldn't presume to judge a man against standards that haven't been defined," he remarks. "If we're going to judge Dodd we've got to judge the system, too."

Anonymous Contributors

Sometimes the "system" works in weird ways. On the fund-raising side, it sanctions sidestepping the intent of laws governing disclosure of campaign contributions, particularly the provision requiring every candidate for Federal office to itemize contributions to him "or to any person with his knowledge or consent."

Thus, without wrenching current interpretations of the law, Democratic Sen. Edward Kennedy of Massachusetts could affirm to the secretary of the Senate that not one cent was collected or spent for his well-financed campaign against Republican George Lodge in 1962 or for his re-election campaign two years later.

Like many other candidates, Sen. Ted presumed that he didn't know who was raising campaign cash for him. Dozens more Congressmen, fearing to drive off contributors who prefer anonymity, similarly thwart the law's intent.

Occasional oddities of timing are also part of the fund-raising system. Friends of Harold Cooley, the North Carolina Democrat who heads the House Agriculture Committee, chose his birthday celebration on July 26, 1965, to raise $35,000 for his re-election campaign this fall. Sponsors of the event have no immediate explanation for the unusually early fund-raising date. But sugar lobbyists who were solicited to buy $50 tickets suspect a reason: On Aug. 18, 1965, Mr. Cooley's committee began hearings on the always controversial bill allocating sugar import quotas; there won't be a sugar bill this year.

Some Congressmen jumped off to an even earlier start for the 1966 campaign. Louisiana's Democratic Rep. Morrison scheduled a testimonial dinner for April 30, 1965, three months ahead of Mr. Cooley. The Louisianan says he doesn't know how much was raised at the $100-a-plate dinner in Baton Rouge ("In our state we don't keep records") and he thinks it best not to tell where the money is stashed. "I'm not going to tell my opponents what I've got or where I got it," he explains.

On the spending side, the system leaves conveniently (some say necessarily) indistinct the boundaries between campaign expenditures, personal expenses and the reimbursed costs of running a Congressional office.

In an election year, an incumbent's office or committee staff may spend full-time back home on political chores while drawing pay from the U.S. Treasury. The cost of a reception for visiting bigwigs from home can come from a Senator's unused stationery allowance, from a special campaign fund or from the Congressman's personal purse.

Dodd's Defense

Sen. Dodd will rely on these fuzzy distinctions to prepare his defense. He will contend that the proceeds from testimonial dinners that weren't clearly billed as campaign fund-raisers qualify as tax-free gift income that he could have used for any purpose. But he will try to prove that he actually spent the money to repay campaign debts, some dating back to 1956, and to defray political expenses averaging about $20,000 annually. If any political funds were spent for personal purposes, he will argue, then it's equally true that personal funds went for political purposes.

In a libel suit filed last week against his original accusers, columnists Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson, the Senator said his tax returns fully reflected taxable income. No campaign funds were diverted to personal use, he insisted, and no services were ever rendered in exchange for gifts. A "Persian rug" supposedly received from Julius Klein, registered U.S. agent for West German business interests, actually was a 9-by-14-inch imitation worth $2, according to the court document. And a "whopping" $50,000 payment said to have come from the Teamsters Union was a court-approved legal fee earned by Mr. Dodd before he came to the Senate for representing dissident Teamster locals.

Some side-effects of Sen. Dodd's troubles are already apparent. President Johnson, perhaps skittish about lending his prestige to such affairs, passed up an expected appearance at ("Naturally you tell 'em what they want to hear," one Senator says) and article-writing (generally by the Congressman's ghost) also yield extra income.

These taxable supplements to Congressional salaries are rarely questioned. But political gifts raise more doubts, and the Dodd affair, no matter how it turns out, is likely to increase these doubts. Rigorous moralists like Delaware's Republican Sen. Williams can't quite believe that people who give money to a politician expect nothing in return.

Democratic Sen. Hart of Michigan stubbed his toe a while back when he publicly called for contributions from constituents to help defray unreimbursed expenses. The Senator's intentions were honorable. He named a committee to handle the money and placed a $100 limit on each contribution; names of donors and figures on committee-approved expenditures were made public. But his attempt to elevate gift-giving to respectability backfired. "He caught so much flak that he quit," an aide says. "Now he digs into his own pocket."

Tax Cases Raise Suspicions

This experience helps explain why the reasons for testimonial celebrations are generally kept deliberately vague, the feeling apparently being that the public is willing to help foot campaign bills but balks at contributing money to be used for a politician's other expenses. Several widely publicized trials of political figures for income tax evasion haven't helped dispel suspicions about the uses to which politicians sometimes put gifts. "Obviously a lot of people think we keep the dough," a Southern Congressman says.

Actually, politicians or any other lucky beneficiaries of testimonial affairs are free to do just that. Moreover, tax rules say the income is tax-free if the celebrators intended "to provide a gift out of respect, in appreciation of public service, or similar non-political motives." (The donor, of course, must pay a Federal gift tax on any amount over $3,000 given to any individual in one year.) Campaign contributions and other politically motivated gifts are taxable income, however, if diverted to the recipient's personal use.

So far, no Washington political figure sufficiently powerful or respected to rate a testimonial has come forth to contend that the proceeds were his to keep. At the state level, though, gift-giving to politicians for their personal benefit is not unknown.

One such fortunate fellow is Massachusetts State Sen. Philip Graham, a respected Republican legislator who, ironically, helped push to passage a state law prohibiting testimonial fund-raising for appointed officials in 1962. Last fall, 2,500 admirers paid $25 each at a dinner to honor Mr. Graham; the event yielded $20,000. "It was," according to Julian F. Begien, Jr., dinner chairman, "a genuine outpouring of friendship because people knew Sen. Graham was ill and needed the money."

state we don't keep records") and he thinks it best not to tell where the money is stashed. "I'm not going to tell my opponents what I've got or where I got it," he explains.

On the spending side, the system leaves conveniently (some say necessarily) indistinct the boundaries between campaign expenditures, personal expenses and the reimbursed costs of running a Congressional office.

In an election year, an incumbent's office or committee staff may spend full-time back home on political chores while drawing pay from the U.S. Treasury. The cost of a reception for visiting bigwigs from home can come from a Senator's unused stationery allowance, from a special campaign fund or from the Congressman's personal purse.

Dodd's Defense

Sen. Dodd will rely on these fuzzy distinctions to prepare his defense. He will contend that the proceeds from testimonial dinners that weren't clearly billed as campaign fund-raisers qualify as tax-free gift income that he could have used for any purpose. But he will try to prove that he actually spent the money to repay campaign debts, some dating back to 1956, and to defray political expenses averaging about $20,000 annually. If any political funds were spent for personal purposes, he will argue, then it's equally true that personal funds went for political purposes.

In a libel suit filed last week against his original accusers, columnists Drew Pearson and Jack Anderson, the Senator said his tax returns fully reflected taxable income. No campaign funds were diverted to personal use, he insisted, and no services were ever rendered in exchange for gifts. A "Persian rug" supposedly received from Julius Klein, registered U.S. agent for West German business interests, actually was a 9-by-14-inch imitation worth $2, according to the court document. And a "whopping" $50,000 payment said to have come from the Teamsters Union was a court-approved legal fee earned by Mr. Dodd before he came to the Senate for representing dissident Teamster locals.

Some side-effects of Sen. Dodd's troubles are already apparent. President Johnson, perhaps skittish about lending his prestige to such affairs, passed up an expected appearance at a recent garden party here celebrating the 25th wedding anniversary of Democratic Sen. and Mrs. McIntyre of New Hampshire; celebrators paid $100 each to help the Senator defray office expenses. North Dakota's Mr. Young, among others, is reassuring constituents that "appreciation" dinners held for him back home weren't intended for his benefit but to fill local GOP coffers.

A Sympathetic Hearing

Even before his current troubles arose, Sen. Dodd was a lone-wolf member of a body that cherishes clubbiness. (Once, an after-dark duel on the Senate floor between Mr. Dodd and Arkansas' Democratic Sen. Fulbright got so heated that some of the language was expunged from the Congressional Record.) Nonetheless, with their own finances in mind, many members will listen sympathetically to Sen. Dodd's explanation that the mounting costs of political life required him to rely on testimonial gifts.

Senate Democratic Whip Russell Long of Louisiana has estimated his "unreimbursed costs of being a Senator" at nearly as much as his $30,000 annual Congressional salary. On one tax return, Sen. Long claimed deductions totaling $28,078 for office expenses back home in Louisiana, plus outlays for television c[illegible] photographs, entertainment, dues to professional organizations, office petty cash, a clipping service "so I could see what a low rat[illegible] I've been getting in the newspapers" and similar costs not covered by regular Congressional allowances. Unlike many lawmakers, Mr. Long has a substantial outside income from which to pay such expenses.

Making Money on the Side

Other examples abound. Democratic Sen. Douglas of Illinois kept track of his "extra" expenses in 1964; they totaled $10,175. Lecture fees and book royalties helped him foot these bills. New Jersey's Democratic Sen. Williams spent $7,245 of his own money one year "in connection with the performance of official duties." He can count partly on outside income from his law practice.

The costs of political life apart from direct campaign expenses are often cited as justification for permitting Congressmen to keep up business associations, practice law or lend the use of their names to help law firms attract clients. Speech-making to trade associations mittee to handle the money and placed a $100 limit on each contribution; names of donors and figures on committee-approved expenditures were made public. But his attempt to elevate gift-giving to respectability backfired. "He caught so much flak that he quit," an aide says. "Now he digs into his own pocket."

Tax Cases Raise Suspicions

This experience helps explain why the reasons for testimonial celebrations are generally kept deliberately vague, the feeling apparently being that the public is willing to help foot campaign bills but balks at contributing money to be used for a politician's other expenses. Several widely publicized trials of political figures for income tax evasion haven't helped dispel suspicions about the uses to which politicians sometimes put gifts. "Obviously a lot of people think we keep the dough," a Southern Congressman says.

Actually, politicians or any other lucky beneficiaries of testimonial affairs are free to do just that. Moreover, tax rules say the income is tax-free if the celebrators intended "to provide a gift out of respect, in appreciation of public service, or similar nonpolitical motives." (The donor, of course, must pay a Federal gift tax on any amount over $3,000 given to any individual in one year.) Campaign contributions and other politically motivated gifts are taxable income, however, if diverted to the recipient's personal use.

So far, no Washington political figure sufficiently powerful or respected to rate a testimonial has come forth to contend that the proceeds were his to keep. At the state level, though, gift-giving to politicians for their personal benefit is not unknown.

One such fortunate fellow is Massachusetts State Sen. Philip Graham, a respected Republican legislator who, ironically, helped push to passage a state law prohibiting testimonial fund-raising for appointed officials in 1962. Last fall, 2,500 admirers paid $25 each at a dinner to honor Mr. Graham; the event yielded $20,000. "It was," according to Julian F. Begien, Jr., dinner chairman, "a genuine outpouring of friendship because people knew Sen. Graham was ill and needed the money."

Court Tells CAB To Restudy Ruling On Florida Routes

Move by Appeals Bench a Gain For Northeast Air, Which Faces Loss of Florida Runs

Judges Seek More Evidence

A WALL STREET JOURNAL News Roundup

Northeast Airlines won the first round in its fight to reverse a Civil Aeronautics Board ruling that would oust it from the East Coast air route to Florida.

A Federal court of appeals in Boston ordered the CAB to reconsider its decision that would end Northeast's flights from Boston and New York to Florida, reducing it from a trunk to a local airline. Northeast will be able to continue flights to Florida until a final decision is reached.

The court indicated it wants the CAB to hold new hearings and submit new findings on the Northeast case. The court, which is retaining jurisdiction of the case, would then decide the future of Northeast on the basis of the new CAB decision and other evidence offered.

In Washington, the CAB refused official comment on the court ruling. A CAB aide said a court rejection of a CAB ruling normally can be appealed by the board to the Supreme Court. He added that the board was undecided whether it would take such a course or submit a new decision to the appeals court.

In any case, it was calculated that a final decision in the Northeast case is probably at least a year away.

CAB Planning at Stake

The appellate court decision was a sharp rebuff for the CAB. The board's decision in the Northeast case was probably the CAB's boldest effort in recent years to engage in economic planning for the airline industry.

The CAB has been thinking of reassessing the "supply" of airline service against "demand" in other areas, too. If the courts ultimately reject the Northeast decision, in all probability the board will back away from economic planning in all areas.

The rejection by the appellate court of the CAB decision is a setback, too, for Eastern Air Lines and National Airlines, Northeast's competitors on the New York-Florida route. They had strongly backed the CAB's attempted ouster of Northeast.

The fundamental basis for the CAB's Northeast decision was that three airlines aren't needed in the New York-Florida market. But Justice Peter Woodbury found that the CAB didn't have, or at least didn't present to the court, sufficient evidence supporting its position that Northeast shouldn't be allowed to fly the Florida route.

Decision Quoted

In a statement concurred in by the two other justices on the court, Judge Woodbury said: "The case must go back to the board for further study, followed by an explicit statement of the issue or issues actually decided and a statement of relevant bases for its decision supported by intelligible findings of fact.

"When we know what the board's decision is and why, the time will be ripe to consider the legal sufficiency of the evidence to support the board's finding."

Northeast took the Florida route case to the court of appeals last fall after the CAB had ordered it to discontinue flights to Florida. At the time the court accepted the case, it granted Northeast authority to continue the Florida flights until a final court decision was reached. Earlier a decision had been expected by April 30.

The CAB granted Northeast a five-year temporary certificate to fly to Florida in 1956. After lengthy hearings the CAB refused to grant Northeast a permanent certificate for the Florida routes and ordered it to end the Southern flights by last Nov. 15. Northeast then appealed to the courts.

When Northeast was granted the temporary certificate, it was expected that the Florida routes would enable it to be a profitable airline. Northeast has failed to operate profitably, and the competing Eastern and National airlines both have had financial problems.

In its decision the court told the CAB, "We do not say that a strong Eastern Air Lines is not a legitimate consideration. We do say good and sufficient reason ought to be given for robbing Peter to pay Paul."

Both Eastern and National had attributed losses to excessive competition on the Florida routes.

James Austin, Northeast president, said: "We are naturally pleased with the decision of the court, and we look forward to the opportunity of having the record opened again before the CAB to prove that Northeast Airlines is rightfully entitled to permanence on the Florida route. We will, of course, continue to operate on the route under the Administrative Procedures Act, and we are entitled to this."

Reserve Official Argues for Unifying Bank Supervision

BY J. L. ROBERTSON

What is H. R. 5874 about? What would it do? Actually, it is about a situation so obviously and admittedly unsatisfactory, and would provide a solution so obviously sound, reasonable and effective, that an intelligent visitor from another planet might be puzzled at its being a matter of controversy.

This bill would put an end to the existing hodge-podge in Federal supervision of the banking industry. It would do this in a very simple and practical way—by unifying in a single agency, concerned exclusively with the supervision of banking, functions that are now, by unfortunate historical accident, scattered among three authorities: The Bureau of the Comptroller of the Currency, the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp.

Imagine a city served by three television stations—all regulated by the Federal Government, as is actually the case. But in my suppositious situation, absurd as it may seem, each station is supervised by a different agency: One by the Federal Communications Commission, one by a Federal Television Board, and one by a Federal TV Authority. Each of these agencies issues its own regulations and interprets the laws as they apply to the stations within its jurisdiction. Consequently, one station is permitted to broadcast commercials at twice normal volume; the second is required to maintain uniform volume at all times; the third must reduce volume by 50% during commercials.

This is a condensation of testimony before the House Banking and Currency Committee by J. L. Robertson, member of the Federal Reserve Board.

Perhaps air transport would provide a better illustration. Imagine two competing lines on the Philadelphia-Chicago route. One is permitted to provide coach service for $30, including a steak dinner; the other, with similar equipment, is required to charge $32 and is restricted to a cheese sandwich.

Of course, these imaginary situations are ludicrous. Any such situation would be unthinkable and intolerable, one would say; and yet this is essentially the way Federal supervision of banking is set up today.

Suppose, in the imaginary instances I have mentioned, a bill was introduced to correct the obvious difficulties by combining the three agencies into one. And suppose further that the bill was opposed on the grounds that perhaps the three might be able to work out an endurable modus vivendi by constant consultation, solicitation of each other's views and study of each other's rules and decisions. I sincerely hope that the Congressional committee would ask: "Why should we continue to muddle along with such an awkward, inefficient, expensive arrangement?"

I shall not go into a long catalog of the built-in deficiencies of the present structure of Federal bank supervision. A handful of instances should suffice. Some of us can recall, for example, the prolonged controversy over absorption of exchange charges. Bank "A" may solicit an important account by offering to absorb all such charges for a prospective customer, but its competitor across the street, Bank "B", also subject to Federal supervision—but by a different supervisor!—is forbidden to do so. This particular struggle "culminated" 20 years ago in extensive hearings, but no solution was developed.

Banking Inconsistencies

There is hardly a section of bank supervision of which a similar sad tale could not be told. In the same town, and subject to the same Federal laws and regulations—but different supervisors—one bank may acquire stock of corporations (even the controlling stock of another bank), but its competitor may not; one is denied the privilege of establishing a drive-in branch, but the other may do so on the ground that the facility is not a branch at all.

In 1960 the Congress passed the Bank Merger Act, which "in the interests of uniform standards" required the three banking agencies to "report" to each other on every proposed merger. Ever since, streams of documents have been flowing between us. Every single merger must be studied by all three agencies. In the past three years the members and staffs of the three agencies have spent on this task innumerable hours that were urgently needed for something more constructive than this duplication of effort. The worst of it is that the duplication has been fruitless; nothing resembling "uniform standards" has evolved.

Particular instances like these are easy to pinpoint. However, the most detrimental results of our divided responsibility are not the direct conflicts and inconsistencies, but rather the delay it causes in the performance of our functions and—most fundamental of all—the seemingly insurmountable obstacles to adequate and correct performance.

Federal bank supervision began just a century ago, with the establishment of the National Banking System. The Federal Reserve Act of 1913 added a second supervisory body, and 20 years later the Federal Deposit Insurance Act created the third. Both of these additions stemmed from economic crises—the Federal Reserve System from the panic of 1907 and the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation from the Great Depression. The need for each was urgent and its benefits patent; for this reason "details" of administration and structure were matters of little concern, and perhaps that was warranted.

However, after these fundamental improvements were achieved, and the structural deficiencies revealed themselves, no correction was made, notwithstanding the introduction in Congress of several bills.

H. R. 5874 is designed to do, and would do, just one thing—it would unify Federal supervision of banking. But simply by doing this, it would accomplish much more. It would end much friction and conflict among banks and bank supervisors. It would eliminate wasteful duplication and overlapping among agencies. It would abolish the existing "triple standard" and enable the banking industry to operate under a single, consistent set of rules, as far as Federal supervision is concerned.

It would do away with a dangerous tendency toward a "race of laxity" in bank supervision that will lead, at an accelerating rate, to deterioration of the standards of sound banking which it is a function of bank supervision to maintain. And it would enable the Federal Reserve Board of which I am a member to devote its time and attention exclusively to its most vital—and increasingly difficult—function: The formulation and execution of monetary policy for the leading industrial nation of the world.

In view of the foregoing, how are we to account for the absence of universal enthusiasm for this bill? For lukewarm acceptance in some quarters and downright opposition in others? In my opinion, it is due principally to lack of complete understanding of the bill and its effects.

Cliches of Opposition

I hope it is realistic, rather than unduly cynical, to say also that it is easier, especially for one who has not read this bill, to take a negative stand. This is particularly true, it seems, if opposition is based on one of the accepted cliches.

I should like to mention a few of these and to comment on them: (1) "The bill would create a Federal super agency in the banking field." (2) "H.R. 5874 would jeopardize the dual banking system." (3) "This proposal would result in a dangerous concentration of power over banking," or, swinging around 180 degrees, (4) "A unified Federal agency would soon become the spokesman for the banking industry rather than its supervisor." And finally, (5) "If there is one thing we don't need it's another Federal commission."

As applied to H.R. 5874, all of these cliches are superficial and erroneous. The pending bill simply does not "create a Federal super agency." The proposed Commission would have no new powers over the banking industry, but only those that are now exercised by one or more of the three agencies. This is not quite true; it would have one new and important power—the power to administer the Federal banking laws in a consistent, equitable, and efficient manner.

What of the charge that H.R. 5874 would jeopardize the dual banking system? On the contrary, enactment of this bill would tend to strengthen the dual banking system. State bank supervisors and their Association would find it possible, for the first time, to solve problems common to state and national banks, member banks of the Federal Reserve System and non-members, by working with a single Federal agency.

Furthermore, H.R. 5874 provides that the costs of supervision of all insured banks—state and national—shall be met out of deposit insurance assessments. In a number of states, because of insufficient funds, bank supervisors have been unable to maintain a staff adequate to carry on the work of their departments, and have had to rely on assistance from Federal examiners. The arrangement provided by the pending bill, by relieving this situation, would enable those states to raise the quality of their own supervision to a satisfactory level.

As this is accomplished, it is contemplated, Federal examination of banks in those states would become less necessary and gradually would be terminated. If this plan succeeds, within a relatively few years we would have a dual banking system in which state banks ordinarily would be examined only by the state authorities, and national banks by the Federal.

As I said before, it is not easy to grapple with the statements of those who oppose the pending bill. For example, how does one deal with the charge that the proposed Commission would have too much power—or too little power? Is it unreasonable to place the burden on those who make these claims, to ask them to show, by chapter and verse, by facts and reasoning rather than unsupported conclusions, how the plan embodied in this bill would produce the evils they describe?

Reduction in Agencies

The last of the cliches I mentioned is that rarity—a fallacious argument that can be refuted by arithmetic. The objection that the bill would create "another" Federal agency simply has the facts backward; the bill actually would result in one less.

I feel compelled to make one further comment. Of course, unification of the supervisory functions is more important than the administrative locus of the combined functions. Instead of a separate Commission such as is provided in this bill, the consolidated functions could be invested, for example, in the Federal Reserve System, as was suggested by the Commission on Money and Credit of the Committee for Economic Development. In my judgment, however, this would be a decidedly inferior solution.

In the first place, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System is fully burdened with functions relating to domestic and international monetary matters. It hardly has enough time, over and above that which is needed to deal effectively with this principal responsibility.

Some witnesses may tell you that bank supervision is a necessary adjunct to the Federal Reserve's responsibilities in the field of money and credit. In response, I would say that bank supervision is too important in the public interest to be treated as an adjunct to any other function. But, even more important, the basic contention is fallacious. The Federal Reserve System could function as a central bank at least equally well—in my judgment, better—if it were to devote its full time to the formulation and execution of monetary policy.

Finally, the argument may be advanced that if unification takes place, the agency might become a captive of the industry. All I can say in rebuttal is that I have too much faith in responsible Government officials to think that risk should be given much weight.

But if the risk does exist, its eventuation would be far more calamitous to the general welfare of the nation if the captive agency also was responsible for the formulation of monetary policy, one of the most vital functions in a free enterprise economy such as ours. Hence, in my view, the plan of unification set forth in H.R. 5874 is markedly preferable.

Mrs. Brown, Adding Female Touch to ICC, Tongue-Lashes Majority on Shielding Rails

The Wall Street Journal
Monday
February 1, 1965
P4

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—Virginia Mae Brown, the attractive brunette President Johnson picked to bring the woman's touch to the Interstate Commerce Commission, gave her male colleagues a tongue-lashing.

"The majority's fear of the forces of competition (in transportation) is unwarranted," she said. The prospects "frighten me not." The ICC's all-male majority is so concerned with protecting railroads from themselves that it is ignoring the public, Mrs. Brown maintained. "Are shippers orphans under the Interstate Commerce Act?" asked the trim mother of two.

Then, with language seldom if ever before heard in the staid old ICC, she declared: "It is well known that there are several ways to kill a cat. Drowning appears to be the most favored. The majority . . . waters the facts and drowns the case."

The case at issue wasn't very big. The Monon Railroad wanted to extend its tracks slightly at Michigan City, Ind., and in Jefferson County, Ky., near Louisville, in order to set up a route for moving coal to steel mills in the Chicago area and, by Great Lakes ships, to other mills.

But Mrs. Brown wasn't alone in feeling the case involved important matters of principle. Four other commissioners also dissented from the majority's decision to reject Monon's application.

The charges leveled by Mrs. Brown, and reflected in the considerably less vigorous dissents of the other four, are the sort that have been voiced in recent years by some—usually professorial types—outside the commission. ICC insiders on occasion have denied vigorously that the agency has tried harder to protect the railroads from competition than to encourage rival services and innovations that shippers want.

Mrs. Brown's dissent was interesting, too, because, as President Johnson's sole appointee to the ICC thus far, she was reflecting and seemed to be elaborating on the Administration's transport policy. The late President Kennedy began a drive to loosen ICC control over rail rates, and Mr. Johnson has endorsed the principle of greater reliance on competition. The ICC opposed the Kennedy approach. It is waiting to see the details of Mr. Johnson's legislative package before taking a stand on it.

To Mrs. Brown, the Monon case seemed classic in terms of what the ICC's role should be. Monon proposed an innovation in coal transport, combining barge movement with an "integral train" that would shuttle between Louisville and Michigan City. Kentucky and West Virginia coal would be moved down the Ohio and other rivers, by barge line, to a rail transfer facility Monon planned to build near Louisville, then shuttled up to a proposed rail-marine terminal at Michigan City. American Commercial Barge Lines supported Monon's application, as did a number of coal shippers, such as Inland Steel Co. It was opposed by a number of coal-hauling railroads, including the Chesapeake & Ohio, the Norfolk & Western, the Pennsylvania and the Illinois Central.

To the ICC majority, the Monon proposal offered no "inherent advantage over existing service." Thus, the majority said: "It would necessarily follow that the construction of superfluous lines and facilities not needed to insure adequate service to the public should not be authorized, and existing carriers should not be required to face unnecessary competition." Anyway, the majority added, railroad tracks cost money "and if operations are not successful, only scrap is left." Monon's proposal wasn't "prudent," it concluded.

Mrs. Brown accused the majority of substituting "the judgment of the regulators" for that of "the market place." She said: "What the majority really has determined here is that no reliance can be placed on the forces of competition." Monon, she said, isn't worried its investment might wind up as scrap, so "should the commission be afraid?"

"Carried to their logical conclusion, the standards applied here would constitute such a straitjacket that any hope for modern, progressive innovations in surface transportation would disappear," Mrs. Brown said.

ICC Chairman Charles Webb, in his separate dissent, said he shared Mrs. Brown's thoughts on innovation. He also charged that the decision gives all-rail movements of coal "unwarranted protection from the competition of barge-rail and barge-rail-lake routes."

Dissenters Laurence Walrath, Kenneth Tuggle and Paul Tierney joined in asserting that "an oversupply of coal transportation does not equate an overabundance of service available to shippers."

General Aniline Sale Today Wraps Up 18-Year Battle

(1) The Wall Street Journal Tuesday March 9, 1965 Page 16

By JERRY LANDAUER

WASHINGTON--Moments before 10:30 this morning two businessmen in separate rooms at the Justice Department will make final whispered double-checks with their home offices via telephone, seal the bulky envelopes they clutch tightly, and scamper 25 yards down the fifth floor corridor to Attorney General Katzenbach's office.

Precisely at the appointed time Mr. Katzenbach will open the envelopes and read the two sets of figures. Immediately thereafter, a seven-man advisory committee headed by Donald C. Cook will retire to an adjoining conference room. Perhaps within minutes, but in no event later than 4:30 p.m., the Attorney General will announce his choice between the bids submitted by representatives of two large competing syndicates of securities underwriters.

There's always the possibility that Mr. Katzenbach, acting on the advisory committee's recommendation, will reject both, but nobody involved in the negotiations expects this. So the winning syndicate probably will register its bid and reoffering price with the Securities and Exchange Commission in New York this very afternoon. And that, except for housekeeping details which include a $25,000 expenditure for printing new stock certificates, will finally complete preparations for selling to the public 11,166,438 shares of General Aniline & Film Corp. (GAF) stock seized by the U.S. as enemy property 23 years ago shortly after the outbreak of World War II.

Today's expected sale not only gets the Government out of the chemical, photographic and dyestuff business; it also ends the exhausting David and Goliath struggle between Interhandel, a Swiss holding company so small that it can operate from a converted residence in Basel, and the mammoth Uncle Sam.

Interhandel's chief reason for existence has been its claim to the vested GAF stock, which represents fully 84% of Interhandel's listed assets. For 18 years the holding company challenged contentions by Republican and Democratic administrations alike that its claim was invalid because its nominal pre-war title to the stock was really a ruse to camouflage the true owner, I. G. Farbenindustrie, the German chemical trust.

With the courts and Congress as the battleground, little Interhandel fought the executive branch to a draw that prevented the Justice Department from ridding itself of GAF. It wasn't until 1963 that Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy broke the deadlock by approving an out-of-court settlement that divides the sales proceeds; Interhandel hopes for $100 million as its share.

Mystery Still Remains

Whether the holding company did conspire to cloak GAF's true ownership will never be known. For despite prolonged legal proceedings that included two trips to the Supreme Court and one to the World Court, the controversy never went to trial. Yet considering the disparity of resources between the contestants and the seeming hopelessness of Interhandel's cause at the start, the handsome share it extracted must be recorded as a memorable upset in the annals of corporate warfare with the Federal Government. How it happened is only now beginning to trickle out.

When American troops stormed into I.G. Farben's smoldering Frankfurt central offices in 1945, documents they retrieved from stairwells, from suitcases buried in a garden and from nearby beer halls and monasteries seemed to show conclusively that GAF indeed was Farben's creature. By 1953, GAF's Government-appointed president was still saying matter of factly, "before the war we were one of the many foreign interests of I. G. Farben." As late as 1958 it seemed certain that Interhandel wouldn't get a dime.

But the fading of war's passions, a series of bad breaks for the Justice Department in court, hidden diplomatic cross-currents and by no means least, the tenacious, clever tactics of Interhandel's gregarious Washington lawyer, John J. Wilson, slowly transmuted what had been Government trumps into deuces. Mr. Wilson has been well rewarded; he has, and will, share substantially in the $4 million to $5 million Interhandel has or will have spent for lawyers, lobbyists and agents.

Another with a stake, political not financial, in the GAF sale is Bobby Kennedy. The settlement he approved with Interhandel became an issue in his ouster of incumbent Sen. Keating last fall; and if the freshman Senator should seek higher office, charges that he "gave away" millions to a former "Nazi front" could be revived.

Mr. Kennedy was clearly aware of the political risk during his final meeting with Alfred Schaefer, who as top man in the Union Bank of Switzerland was Interhandel's chief negotiator. Dissatisfied with the settlement reached with Mr. Katzenbach, then the deputy attorney general, Mr. Schaefer sought sweeteners from the boss.

"My people tell me they can beat you (in court)," said Mr. Kennedy, brushing in tax claims disputed by Interhandel, would be siphoned off the top before an equal division of remaining proceeds. But Mr. Katzenbach induced Interhandel to pay the $24 million from its half. And because the Swiss haven't contested 11% of the stock up for sale today, Mr. Kennedy can contend that the division of dollars favors the U.S. by about 2 to 1; most of the U.S. share will go into the war claims fund.

The jousting that led to this settlement took place in three arenas: Congress, the courts and the conference room. Legislatively, the Justice Department repeatedly over the years sought permission to sell GAF and place the proceeds in escrow pending outcome of the continuing court struggle. Early passage of the sales bill might have compelled Interhandel to settle for a few cents on the dollar, for the holding company's major bargaining lever was the Government's increasing desire to unload its corporate ward. But if the Government could divest GAF before settling with Interhandel, then it could afford to wait for the holding company to approach it hat in hand.

The Swiss, however, neatly deflected the department's legislative thrust. Interhandel's lawyers persuaded some Congressmen that conversion of vested assets without the claimant's permission was unconstitutional. For $40,000 a year, the holding company employed a lobbyist, now dead, who enjoyed convivial relations with key members of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The Justice Department had no better luck in its courtroom skirmishes with Interhandel's Mr. Wilson. Federal judges tended to agree with Mr. Wilson that the statute under which the Government vested GAF prohibited tampering with the company's stock if ownership was in dispute. Hence, GAF couldn't recapitalize, amend its charter to permit expansion, or, when one supplier said it no longer could supply highly sensitized photographic paper, trade stock for a new source.

Interhandel's harassment not only harmed GAF's competitive position but it combined with two key legal developments in 1958 that shoved the Government to the bargaining table.

Most important was a Supreme Court decision in June that ended an eight-year effort to kick Interhandel out of court on grounds that it hadn't fully complied with judicial orders calling for the production of voluminous bank records. Overriding four lower court decisions, the Justices held that Interhandel's claim couldn't be dismissed solely because Swiss secrecy laws blocked the records.

Government Surprised

This reinstatement of Interhandel's claim burst like a bomb on the Justice Department, for by then the Government was unprepared for trial. The mainstays of the original litigating team, including several German Jewish refugees, had departed in 1957, confident that the case into which they had poured brain and heart for a decade was finally won; the Supreme Court had already rejected one petition for review.

As a result of the unexpected setback the Department found itself in an ironic situation. For years it had alleged that Interhandel sought refuge behind the bank secrecy laws to withhold incriminating documents. But now that the case was headed toward trial the department lacked the manpower to cope with the records it had. "The records piling up in this case are appalling," moaned Assistant Attorney General Dallas S. Townsend in 1960. When Messrs. Kennedy and Katzenbach assumed responsibility for GAF, the department's files bulged with 240,000 documents, mostly in German script, on miles of microfilm. Only the opposition's Mr. Wilson knew where to find what. For him the litigation was a career, not a case.

The second 1958 development was barely noticed. Liquidators of the Farben empire, believing that Interhandel had swiped at least part of GAF's stock from Germans, filed suit to intervene in the U.S. litigation. Farben's claim signaled potential dynamite. To the suspicious it meant that some dollars from Interhandel's share of any settlement might wind up in Germany. Moreover, Farben's assertion of interest in the vested stock tended to undermine Interhandel's denial of the cloaking charge.

The West German government was no more anxious than the American to exhume Farben's ghost. So, after one motion by the liquidators to intervene was rejected, Bonn quietly exerted influence to quell the claim; even a routine appeal wasn't taken. With the specter of Farben dispelled, another obstacle to U.S. bargaining was removed.

The holding company sought the services of Charles E. Wilson, the well-connected retired president of General Electric Co., to press its advantage. Mr. Wilson satisfied himself that Interhandel's cause was just; moreover, he believed the sanctity of private property was at stake. So, in May 1960, he signed on as Interhandel's uncompensated negotiating agent with full power-of-attorney.

Mr. Wilson, however, had no luck in persuading the Eisenhower Administration, perhaps because the 1960 Presidential election loomed, to settle on terms satisfactory to the Swiss. When the Kennedy Administration took office, Mr. Schaefer decided he'd test the new Washington mood alone.

The Swiss banker crossed the Atlantic thinking he had appointments with Secretary of State Rusk and Secretary of the Treasury Dillon. But his arrival coincided with the Bay of Pigs disaster. No one with decision-making authority could see him, so he left in a huff. Earnest negotiations didn't resume until a year later when a Justice Department team met him in Germany.

Later Mr. Katzenbach, today's envelope-opener, sealed the bargain—a bargain that concludes a decades-long journey for Interhandel from, in the words of John J. Wilson, "zero to a hundred million."

Hearing Examiners Play Key Role in Operations Of Regulatory Agencies

Rulings Usually Become Final Verdicts; Some Don't Balk At Breaking New Ground

Angering the Broadcasters

By WAYNE E. GREEN
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON — Officials at the Federal Communications Commission groaned a few days ago when they learned what Thomas H. Donahue had done.

At a time when the FCC is sensitive to industry charges that it's putting broadcast licenses up for grabs to new applicants, Mr. Donahue, an FCC hearing examiner, calmly recommended that the agency strip RKO General Inc. of its license to operate a Los Angeles television station. He said the license should go to Fidelity Television Inc., a competing applicant, although neither Fidelity nor RKO General "is any bargain" as a broadcaster.

"I'll bet the commissioners recoiled when they read that," says an FCC staff official, adding that "those examiners run wild sometimes."

As one of some 600 hearing or trial examiners who hear cases and make preliminary decisions for 22 Federal agencies, the silver-haired Mr. Donahue isn't unaccustomed to such comments. But examiners have had to get used to more of them lately because they're handling bigger cases, with knottier problems, and a few maverick examiners like Mr. Donahue seem determined to speak their minds even when it ruffles someone's feelings.

At the Interstate Commerce Commission, for example, ICC Examiner John S. Messer has kicked up a hot controversy by telling the ICC it should force railroads to improve their passenger service; the agency decided this month it didn't have the authority. And the Civil Aeronautics Board found itself the target of thousands of irate letter-writers after CAB Examiner Arthur Present recommended abolishing the popular airline youth-fare discounts; the board refused to go along.

Losing Anonymity

As a result of such cases, the examiner—long anonymous despite his influence in big economic decisions—is growing less anonymous. He is drawing some of the attention heretofore focused on an agency's governing board or commission. He's "more and more the embodiment of whatever justice there is in the system," says John T. Miller, [illegible]

Losing Anonymity

As a result of such cases, the examiner—long anonymous despite his influence in big economic decisions—is growing less anonymous. He is drawing some of the attention heretofore focused on an agency's governing board or commission. He's "more and more the embodiment of whatever justice there is in the system," says John T. Miller Jr., a Washington lawyer practicing before Federal regulatory agencies. "He's becoming the face of the Government."

An examiner's job is similar in many ways to that of a trial judge. (In fact, examiners want their name changed to administrative trial judge because too many people think a hearing examiner is someone who doctors ears.) He presides over court-like hearings, complete with harried stenotypists, bickering lawyers and nervous witnesses. He makes rulings—called initial or recommended decisions—that are subject to review by the agency's governing body.

Regulatory experts generally agree the hearing examiner plays a crucial role in Government regulation of industry. He gets first crack at a case, for one thing; his decision on, say, motions to introduce evidence may largely determine the shape of the factual record the agency later reviews. His analysis and conclusions are increasingly relied on by agency members inundated by growing caseloads. And in most cases, the examiner's decision becomes the final verdict.

Numbers Grow

What's more, the corps of hearing examiners has been gradually expanding in number and scope. There are now three times more hearing examiners than there were just after World War II, and they deal with about one-third more kinds of cases, says John W. Macy Jr., former Civil Service Commission chairman.

What makes examiners unique in the Government's regulatory system is their independence. The law makes examiners subject to an agency's administrative direction, but they aren't dependent on it for decisions about pay, promotion or removal; those are handled by the Civil Service Commission. The aim is to insulate the examiner from undue pressure that might affect his decision.

Some examiners bluntly assert their independence, as Mr. Donahue did in the case of RKO General, a subsidiary of General Tire & Rubber Co. That decision defied broadcasters who contend that recent FCC decisions have had the effect of subjecting their licenses to claim-jumpers. It also came at a time when the FCC is trying to soft-pedal those decisions, fearful of a bill introduced by Democratic Sen. John Pastore of Rhode Island that would make it tougher for a new applicant to compete for a license at renewal time.

ICC Examiner Messer discomfited both his agency and the rail industry in a case involving charges that the Southern Pacific Co. had deliberately let passenger service deteriorate. The ICC has been under Congressional pressure to do something about the rapid decline of passenger trains, and the Southern Pacific case raised the basic issue of the commission's jurisdiction to investigate and rule on the adequacy of rail passenger service.

Setting Standards

To the ICC's chagrin, Mr. Messer not only concluded the ICC has the authority but said the agency should set minimum standards for such things as comfort and cleanliness in dining and sleeping cars and for speed. "The time has come when the commission can no longer act like a county coroner," Mr. Messer admonished. "The urgent need is for preventive medicine." Not surprisingly, his decision was appealed to the ICC, which ruled that it would need new legislation before taking such action.

While Mr. Messer's ruling apparently was popular with the public, that's not always true of independent-minded decisions. Consider CAB Examiner Present's ruling on complaints by several bus companies against youth-fare discounts offered by 24 U.S. airlines. Mr. Present, himself the father of two teen-agers eligible for the discounts, recommended that such fares be abolished because they're "unjustly discriminatory" against older passengers who must pay full fares.

Following that decision, the CAB was bombarded with more than 10,000 protesting letters, telegrams and petitions from campuses across the country. One Western Michigan University student even threatened to organize a national student boycott against airlines if the CAB upheld the decision. In late August, the CAB decided such fares aren't discriminatory, though it ordered rehearing of the case on other grounds.

Some regulatory experts believe these independent decisions tend to strain relations between examiners and their agency. They create "an unspoken hostility," as one examiner puts it. Commission members like ICC Chairman Virginia Mae Brown dispute that assertion, however. Mrs. Brown says it "gives us a sense of direction when an examiner tries something new."

There's disagreement among examiners over how far their independence should extend. Does it entitle them to break with past agency policy? The ICC's Mr. Messer says he won't "blindly ignore" ICC precedent, but there are times when "I'll make my own finding in spite of it."

However, there are dozens of examiners who feel adherence to precedent is the only practical course. Says Stanley N. Ohlbaum, an examiner at the National Labor Relations Board: "I can disagree with the board, but I know I'll be reversed." Adds FCC Examiner Herbert Sharfman: "You have to be an organization man in a sense, I guess."

Few Rulings Overturned

There are few precise figures on how often agencies reverse their examiners. But statistics for 1964-66, supplied to the Civil Service Commission by four agencies employing 80% of all Federal hearing examiners, indicate the agencies overturned (in whole or part) only a small percentage of the decisions: 6% at the CAB, 20% at the ICC and NLRB and 4% at the Social Security Administration. (The Social Security examiners rule on claims for disability benefits.) Some outside observers suggest that the relatively small number of reversals may mean that some examiners reach only those decisions least likely to be overruled.

Quite apart from the possibility of reversal, there are other pressures to examiners. When ICC Examiner Robert Murphy recommended approval of the so-called Northern Lines Rail merger a few years ago, he found both his decision and himself attacked by the Justice Department and several state governments. In asking the ICC for a rehearing, they charged he was "biased and prejudiced" in favor of the merging roads.

The ICC eventually cleared Mr. Murphy in a detailed order that rejected the allegations as "baseless and reckless." Last January the ICC had to defend another examiner, W. Wallace Wilhite, who was criticized for allegedly traveling and dining with railroad officials during hearings on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad's request to drop two passenger trains.

Prodded by Democratic Sen. Gale McGee of Wyoming, the ICC investigated the complaints and cleared Mr. Wilhite of any wrongdoing. But in appealing to a Federal court the ICC's decision to grant the Chicago-Burlington request, several parties contended that the commission should have held hearings on the complaints against the examiner. However, the court upheld the ICC's action without finding fault with the examiner's conduct.

The charges illustrate a perennial problem for examiners who must travel outside Washington to hold hearings: How much contact, outside the hearing room, should examiners have with parties to the case?

Some examiners, like recently retired James Cunningham of the FCC, often refuse even to stay in the same hotel with participants in proceedings before them. But others will sometimes dine with lawyers for both sides. The potential danger is the appearance of collusion that may result. "You and I may know this is okay," says an ICC attorney, "but what about some poor guy in a town that's losing its last passenger train? He sees them socializing and it upsets him—and justifiably so."

There are other problems for the traveling examiner, too, such as finding a suitable hearing room. Some hearings are held in hotel rooms, fire stations, boiler rooms or basements. The NLRB's Mr. Ohlbaum recalls a Social Security hearing he conducted in a jail because a prisoner there was the sole witness.

Since some hearings move from town to town on a tight schedule, another problem is the long-winded witness. Sometimes a witness can't be stopped, as the ICC's Mr. Messer learned several years ago. When he had to cut short a woman's testimony in a passenger train case, she went to the local radio station, bought 30 minutes of air time and had her say the next morning while he was eating breakfast.

Becoming an Examiner

It isn't easy to get an examiner's job. To qualify for appointment requires membership in the bar and seven years of legal training, including two years in administrative law. A applicant also must survive a five-hour test of his ability to write an examiner's decision, plus an exhaustive oral interview. Only a tenth of all who apply end up on the lists of eligibles; even fewer are actually appointed.

When an agency has a vacancy, it notifies the Civil Service Commission, which usually furnishes three names for consideration. The commission normally selects the three people who scored highest on the qualifying tests. However, certain agencies can reject anyone who doesn't have specialized knowledge of their field; the aim is to eliminate a lengthy training period.

But the procedure has drawn sharp criticism, mainly from the American Bar Association's administrative law section. It complains that many agencies encourage their own employes to apply for an examiner's job, then pick only those employes who become eligible.

The critics say this creates "inbreeding" in an agency and discourages high-caliber lawyers in private practice from applying. "We don't question the quality of the men," says Mr. Miller, the Washington attorney, "but it's this loading of the dice that puts the agency lawyers on top."

The ABA group says that in 1967 some 80% of those on the highest-rated eligibility register came from Federal, state or local government, and most of those from Federal service. The Civil Service Commission counters that 70 out of 150 examiners appointed between 1964 and 1968 came either from state or local agencies or from private practice.

Those who do become examiners have a relatively well-paying job, with current salaries ranging from $15,812 to $31,724 annually. And while an examiner doesn't quite have the security of a lifetime appointment, he can be removed only for "good cause," and such dismissals are rare.

Reaching a Decision

An examiner's job varies with the agency that employs him. But the examiner's basic function is the same in almost all agencies: Build a factual record and make a decision supported by legal reasoning.

To get some idea of what this involves, trace the steps in Mr. Messer's decision on the Southern Pacific passenger train case. When the ICC examiner was assigned that case in September 1967, work already was waiting. Stacked in Mr. Messer's office was a three-foot pile of legal pleadings filed by five states that were complaining about the train's service. Close by was a similar stack of letters from worried citizens who felt the Southern Pacific wanted to drop the train, the last rail passenger service between New Orleans and the West Coast.

Mr. Messer spent most of the next few days and nights digesting the pleadings so he would be ready for the hearings. At the same time, he was outlining his thoughts on the critical issue of the ICC's jurisdiction in the case. That part of his final opinion was "roughly" written even before the hearings started, he says.

The hearings opened in New Orleans on Nov. 27, then moved to Houston, El Paso, Tucson and finally Los Angeles. Southern Pacific kept two attorneys traveling from city to city, opposed by attorneys from each state.

The hearings lasted a few days in each city except Los Anegles, where Southern Pacific spent most of three weeks rebutting the charges against it. The states had argued their case first, bringing in dozens of irate train passengers to testify against the quality of the service. To squeeze in all who wanted to testify—as many as 40 witnesses in one day—the hearings sometimes began at 8 a.m. and finished at 10 p.m.

There were 370 witnesses in all, and the hearings lasted eight weeks, finishing on Jan. 10, 1968. It took another three months for the lawyers to file their final briefs. Meanwhile, Mr. Messer was perusing 3,958 pages of transcript and 172 exhibits, and he was beginning to write an opinion. Before finishing, Mr. Messer put together 19 different drafts "using scissors, Scotch tape and rewriting." His final opinion, 50 pages long, was announced on April 23, some eight months after the case began.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 87th CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

A Study of the American Character

OF

HON. EUGENE J. McCARTHY

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, August 7, 1961

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions of the Fund for the Republic late in May sponsored a week long conference in Washington, D.C. This conference marked the opening of the Center's project to make a study of the American character.

As a part of the conference, a dinner meeting honoring Justice Hugo Black of the U.S. Supreme Court was held on June 1. The chairman of the meeting was Elmo Roper, and the main speakers were Dr. Robert M. Hutchins of the Fund for the Republic, and Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr, two men who have done much to influence the course of philosophy, of theology, and of education in the United States in this century. Their speeches were important in two respects: First, in setting the framework for an inquiry into the American character; and second, as a means of giving direction to that inquiry. We must not expect a study of the American character to deal only with the good, the reasonable, and the logical. We must expect it to deal also with contradictions, with faults of character, with inadequacies.

Dr. Niebuhr's speech was not so much a criticism of the American character as an objective, honest, and searching inquiry. The burden of his plea was basically this, that we be honest with ourselves.

Dr. Hutchins spoke primarily of political philosophy, the Constitution, and the role of law and of education. A necessary part in clarifying our judgments concerning the American character is the capacity for self-criticism, both as to our ideas and our institutions and procedures. These two speeches, together with the remarks of Elmo Roper and the gracious response of Justice Hugo Black should sustain and stimulate every American who is concerned to know himself and his country better.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the speeches of Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr and Dr. Robert Hutchins, together with the introductory remarks of Elmo Roper, chairman of the board for the Fund for the Republic, and also the remarks of Justice Black made at the dinner meeting in his honor.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY ELMO ROPER, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF THE FUND FOR THE REPUBLIC, IN INTRODUCING DR. REINHOLD NIEBUHR AT A DINNER MEETING ON THE AMERICAN CHARACTER AT THE SHOREHAM HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D.C., JUNE 1, 1961

Ladies and gentlemen, distinguished Members of the Congress, fellow Americans, I should now like to introduce to you a distinguished scholar, theologian, and social critic, a man whose contribution to the thought of our time has arisen from a unique ability to understand both sides of any intellectual or social problem, to grasp the ambiguity of all human truth and the transitoriness of all human solutions, but who has never let his all-encompassing insight paralyze his ability to judge and to act in the name of the highest religious ideals.

He has had the courage and clear-sightedness to work for the relative and partial goods that are attainable on earth. He has never fallen under the spell of utopian dreams that permanent social justice can be achieved, and he has never forgotten that the only justification of social reforms lies in their ability to enlarge the freedom of the individual human being. Yet he has never drawn from these insights into the nature of man the conclusion that social change is futile and that things were better left as they are. On the contrary, through his double vision of man's divine potentiality and man's human actuality he has been inspired to work for as much liberty, equality, and justice as it is humanly possible to achieve.

In his 30 years as professor of applied Christianity at Union Theological Seminary and in his even longer career as writer, he has inspired students, religious scholars, and secular thinkers by his religious and social insights.

I present to you the vice president emeritus of Union Theological Seminary, Reinhold Niebuhr.

ADDRESS BY DR. REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Justice Black, and ladies and gentlemen, apologies are boring and I am not going to spend time in apologizing for speaking even for half an hour on this tremendous subject of "The American Character," particularly to an audience that is made up of learned scholars and learned practitioners of the political art who, as it were, know American character in the raw. I can only say that we of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions have launched this project this week—our study of the American character—and I hope, though it is precarious and hazardous, that it will succeed and be creative and that my contribution this evening will be valid if it is related to the historical setting.

Let me begin by giving my definition of "character." I think that the character of individuals and of nations is a pattern of consistency that is woven by historical circumstances. The "woof" is the physical circumstances of life, and the warp comprises the cultural, spiritual, and moral endowments of individuals or of nations.

I think all judgments about character are bound to be speculative and challengeable though they can be partially validated by setting them in historical context.

As far as our great Nation is concerned, we can simply define the "woof and warp" of it. The "woof" is the fact that we were born on a virgin continent. (My English friends remind me that it really wasn't "virgin"; there were Indians here, and after we prayed to God we preyed upon them). Anyway we were on a partially virgin continent and had a tremendous hinterland and could occupy it without let or hindrance under the sanction of "manifest destiny." And the continent was endowed with great natural resources. This is the "woof" of our national character.

The "warp" of it is that we fancied, for obvious but in the light of history, not very plausible reasons, that we had embarked on an entirely new beginning for mankind. The settlers of Massachusetts thought they had made a new beginning for a purified church; in Virginia settlers thought they had made a new beginning for a purified political community, because they assumed that if you got rid of the absolutism of monarchy, you got rid of evil—as the Communists now think if you get rid of capitalism, you get rid of evil. There has been, therefore, a note of messianism in our national character from that day to this day. Think of how near hysterical we have been recently about the national purpose, whether we have a national purpose or what the national purpose is. (Obviously our national purpose is to do our duty within the limits of our capacities in the situation in which we find ourselves.)

So we are basically Messianists. The spiritual endowments we have and on which we pride ourselves are also somewhat dubious, more dubious than we like to admit. The Calvinists of Massachusetts said the proof of our virtue would be found in our prosperity—which was a questionable proposition, because in this great country we were bound to be prosperous, but prosperity would make for self-righteousness.

This was the original woof and warp of our historical destiny. I am going to speak briefly now of how this has worked out in history on various levels of life and in different realms of thought and action. I will begin with the obvious—our character in the international community. All of our thoughts and responsibilities are now suffused with the idea that we are one of the two great imperial powers that control the world; we are engaged with the other imperial power in a tremendous wrestling match on the abyss of a possible nuclear catastrophe.

How did we get this way? It was only a quarter of a century ago that we were isolationists, and rather neurotic isolationists at that. A persistent theme running through our national life was the idea of designing European devils trying to outrage our American innocence and to draw us into the competitions of Europe. For instance, we were—in our own view—seduced into the First World War. But then we emerged out of the Second World War the most powerful democratic nation on earth. I think we have to admit now that we are the leader of the free world not purely by our virtue, but by our power, by controlling—as the Russians control—a vast continental economy.

It is an interesting thing that our isolationism was partly selfish. It wasn't quite what the psychiatrists call a "return to the womb" that we sought—it was merely a grasping after the cradle of our continental security. After technology had overwhelmed this continental security, the original desire for our primitive innocence remained. We had a dark suspicion that power meant responsibility and responsibility meant guilt—the guilt that we are involved in by the evil that we do in order to do good. We are never quite willing to accept that there is evil in our good—that's what makes us rather vexatious partners to our allies.

But we have done fairly well, and now we are in this imperial position, knowing full well that our power spells responsibility, and that exercising that responsibility means that our actions are all mixed with guilt.

There are some remaining problems for us. There is, for instance, the problem that we think our own history should point the way to the world how to get out of the nuclear dilemma. Weren't we one of the two nations (with Israel of old) that was formed by a contract? Can't we form a world community by a similar contract? Can't we get rid of all this terrible conflict and competition between two communities by a contract? By a world constitutional convention? I know that I am stepping on the tender toes of some of my intimate colleagues in this vicinity when I say that this is an evasion. I don't see how it is possible to establish a supersovereignty by a pure contract and subordinate the prestige and the power of these two great imperial nations, the United States and U.S.S.R., not to speak of de Gaulle's France.

Another great temptation that we have faced with relative success is that it is very difficult for us, who believe we are masters of our fate and destiny, to be so frustrated in the day of our great power. Can't we use our power to cut through all these frustrations? But that might entail bringing history to a tragic end by bringing it to a neat conclusion.

Now I don't think I can solve the nuclear dilemma, but I would like to observe that we all hope some kind of disarmament agreement will gradually come—some solution will emerge out of these tortuous negotiations. I assume of course that there is a possibility of some kind of uneasy partnership between these two imperial nations despite the fact that one of them is governed by a very dogmatic utopian and messianic creed.

In regard to adjusting ourselves to an industrial civilization, let me be equally modest and say that I think we ought to realize that not only we but all the Western European democracies had the great problem in the late 19th century of adjusting the individualistic idealism of the 18th and early 19th century to the social facts of an industrial civilization, which is bound to be collective. Here we succeeded as did the West European nations and the British Commonwealth. All of us, therefore, made ourselves immune to the Communist rebellion against democracy.

We succeeded, first, because we had proved on the one hand that there was a real force in equal political power guaranteed by the right of suffrage. And secondly, we established justice by raising up a countervailing power—the strong labor union—against the power of the corporation, which had centralized power by its innate capacities. So we have two quasi-sovereignties today, the big union and the big corporation.

There is no way to establish a tolerable justice without an equilibrium of power. That is what we have learned and learned it rather tardily. But why were we so tardy? Because, among other reasons, we were a wealthy nation and our social mobility made class resentment less pervasive. The class resentment that for good reasons was the instrument of social change in Europe evaporated among us. And then there was the frontier. You could always solve the vexatious problem of collective justice, or at least put it off, by heeding Horace Greeley's advice, "Young man, go west." So we had the frontier. The frontier established the kind of liberty and equality without revolution that eluded the most radical revolution—the democratic revolution of Europe. But this put a note of sentimentality into all our politics. I don't think there is a question about it, a note of sentimentality. We think all these things are easier than they are: we do not recognize fully the recalcitrance of human nature against the norms and ideals of human history and destiny.

Let me move on to another great question about our national character—racial justice. You remember the distinguished Swedish social scientist Gunnar Myrdal wrote on the American dilemma, how tragic that dilemma is. A dilemma throughout our history. For instance, while Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence, "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal," Negro slaves were working in his garden. It may be heretical to say anything critical of Thomas Jefferson, but I am going to repeat what John Quincy Adams said; he said that Thomas Jefferson himself wasn't rigorous enough in applying the Declaration of Independence to the conditions of Virginia. Anyway the Declaration of Independence didn't help our Negro friends very much nor were the 13th and 14th amendments of immediate help. Now we are engaged in the agonies of establishing the validity and the honesty of our democratic creed for our Negro fellow citizens.

This is a tortuous process. I mustn't speak too much about that in the presence of distinguished members of the Supreme Court, because what is involved in it, I think, is a fascinating relationship between the majesty of the law, and the recalcitrance of local mores. I have had some difference of attitudes about the great decision that your Court made, Mr. Justice Black, 7 years ago. Sometimes I thought it was morally the greatest thing; then I thought since it tended to polarize and make the bad people worse and the good people better, it wasn't politically prudent even though it might be morally wise. But now I realize that it was absolutely necessary, because the basic difficulty is that the Negro is guilty of a crime against the rest of us: he diverges so obviously from the white man's God-like image of himself. You cannot get rid of that, either by moral suasion or by law but you have to do it both ways.

And I am glad we are doing it both ways. I am sorry that in this respect the Protestant Church has been so tardy. I say the Protestant Churches not the Catholic Church because the Protestant Church has proved itself in this case to be a kind of middle-class white conventicle that has forgotten the universal norms of the Christian faith. But we are making progress here too, so we can be moderately proud and moderately humble about our character as an interracial community.

Certainly, as Henry Steele Commager reminded us during our conference this week, our religious life is unique on account of our pluralism. We have every Protestant sect in America and here every sect becomes a church, and every church becomes a sect. Even the Catholic Church becomes a sect in America—that is, not in their esteem but in our esteem.

We have the largest and most creative Jewish religious minority group of any Western nation. I am particularly interested in this, because the relationship of Christians to Jews is one of the scandals of Western civilization as we all know. When I took the position 5 years ago—I took it 20 years ago but it was not publicized until 5 years ago—that Christians didn't have any business converting Jews, I had three kinds of reactions to my proposal. One was, "You are right, no matter what." The second was, "You're right, but you are heretical." And the third was, "You are wrong because you are heretical."

There is a simple way of solving the third one by saying, "You must have a wrong definition of heresy."

There was this great challenge, a Jewish minority. We haven't begun fully to fulfill our democratic and Christian moral creed in regard to the Jewish minority, particularly with reference to recognizing that the Jews—in my opinion—have a positive ability, not to say genius, for civic righteousness. I could elaborate on that much more but I'll leave it at that.

Another important challenge was the growth of a great disciplined Church, the Roman Catholic Church, first by immigration, and then, may I say, perhaps by outbreeding us, they have become more numerous. So all of our defensive reactions as Protestants are engaged in the power of this great Church. We had some experience in the last campaign which would indicate that this is not an academic question. The amount of hate mail I received from Protestant sectarians—on the whole from the fundamentalist sects—was shocking. They thought that if we elected Mr. Kennedy President, the Pope would run America. At that time I had a little dialog with the distinguished Jesuit theologian, Gustave Weigel, and I agreed that he was right in saying that the Catholic Church allows Catholic statesmen to speak for a consensus beyond anything the Church might say, but I added what also must be observed, that frequently the Catholic statesman takes more freedom than the Church finds convenient.

I think we non-Catholics ought to appreciate this church that from our standpoint may represent a bit of medieval vestigial remnant. We ought not condescend to it like that, because we ought to recognize that it has two great virtues which, on the whole, individualistic Protestantism, or secularism, or what-have-you does not have. I am going to say this in appreciation of Catholicism. I hope that Monsignor Lally after I have finished won't say, "God deliver us from our friends." I appreciate the Catholic Church because it was able to do something that I think is quite marvelous and that is, to take a priestly monarchy which at one time in the Middle Ages thought it was going to be the supersovereignty over all the nations, and make it a general instrument of a universal religious community, the only really universal Christian community. Incidentally, I hope that this isn't a liberal heresy—but I don't think this can be done without the institution of monarchy. If that be heresy, make the most of it.

Now the Catholic Church has two great advantages, one is that it never questions the social substance of human existence, that we are not just individuals but individuals who are fulfilled in, and frustrated by, our communties. The Catholic Church has an abiding sense of community. Its conceptions of justice are too fixed for me; they do not care enough about or take enough cognizance of the historical contingencies. For instance, take the population problem—the church's prohibition of birth control. But why should I go into this, when I want to appreciate the fact that the Catholic Church supports a natural law that has some relevance to an industrial civilization? I think it is marvelous that a church which I once thought could not extricate itself unaided from a medieval society has done very well in adjusting itself to a modern industrial society—better than most of us. This is one of its great virtues.

It is also a citadel which has guarded by its dogmas, which are probably irrelevant to many modern secular or Protestant Americans, the integrity and responsible freedom of the individual against the hazards of a technical, technocratic culture and civilization. This is a tremendous achievement.

I don't say that the Catholic Church is the only one that does this. I think that every institution of learning, and every religious institution ought to do this, but one of the great problems of the American character is how are we going to come to terms with the pressing problems of a technical society? We define "technique" simply as the mastery of nature, man's scientific mastery of nature, which leaves many questions of human existence out, particularly the question about the individual, and the question about the meaning of his existence. Here is the Catholic Church, which is a very nonindividualistic institution, nevertheless having this citadel for the individual. I think we ought to be grateful that in an open society, there could be this voice about individual destiny that transcends all our social destinies.

What about this strange and pathetic individual, who is so insignificant in the coherences and incoherences of nature and history and so significant to himself and to the people who love him? He is going to die as all the animals die. Though he thinks he ought not to die and hopes that he is not going to die, he would not know what to do with eternity if he had it—what are you going to do with the pathos and incongruity of this individual existence? And what are you going to do if he asks the question, "What is the meaning of my individual and my collective destiny anyway?"

Now, here I must confess another heresy. Being a liberal in politics I have been rather consistently antiliberal in culture because I think it is rather pathetic that this great liberal culture of ours, this Western culture of ours, should interpret the meaning of human existence in terms of two very dubious dogmas, the "perfectibility of man," and the "inevitability of progress" in a nuclear age. Certainly, there must be some voice that says "this isn't true," and for my part I am glad that we have an open society in which either the Christian standpoint, or the Catholic Christian standpoint is not annulled or silenced, and where the secular society with all its wonderful scientific disciplines can challenge the inevitable obscurantism of the religious community, which is always involved in obscurantism because it claims that its symbols or its historical facts are more than historical facts. This is, in other words, a problem we are not going to solve, but thank God we have a community in which every one of these answers is still heard. We haven't solved the problem of the meaning of our existence and it has become more unsolvable because we are in conflict, in competition, with a very technocratic society that defines the uniqueness of man by saying that he is a toolmaking animal. We are certainly a little more than that.

I must admit that my friend Sir Charles Snow is right and say we have a particular reason for being somewhat technocratic because all the poor nations of the world are trying to get our technocracy; we are legitimately technocratic, but we ought to have some apprehensions about the preoccupation of man with the tools of life.

I must come to a conclusion. There are many other problems we could consider in the American character. I should say that any of our studies would have to analyze the American heritage in order to show what is perennially valid in this glorious liberal heritage of the 18th century Founding Fathers, and what must be adjusted to the facts of a collectivist society. There, I think it is worth observing that we don't necessarily turn from error—the error of utopianism, messianism, and liberalism and individualism—to the truth of our realism, but that we are turning back to a much richer truth that our Founding Fathers collectively had. You take the idealism of Jefferson, the sober realism of a Madison, and the wintry pessimism of John Adams, not to say the cynicism of an Alexander Hamilton, all have their place in the threshing floor of an open society where truth is separated from error and error from truth. Incidentally, in this open society, we have a place even for those systems which believe that the truth should be guaranteed by authority, religious or political, against error. This is also a great achievement of our free society.

We must look at the past not only because it shows us how finite we are, what creatures of our determinations, but because we are also responsible agents in history and we must study the past to free ourselves for the future. Freedom is the knowledge of necessity, though not in the way that Hegel and Marx said it was. We must have the knowledge of our finite determinations of the past, in order that we may be free to master our destiny in the future. We must know the past, and then we must not be preoccupied with it.

I must close with a word from one of the greatest statesmen of our age, Sir Winston Churchill. In a memorable address he made in New York after the war, during the Berlin airlift, he said something like this about the past and the future and about man's determination of freedom. He said: "Our airlift has won us the hearts of the German people, gentlemen. I hope you won't be offended that I think it important to win the hearts of the German people seeing they did us so much wrong—but, gentlemen, let us only remember so much of the past as will make us creative in the future."

STATEMENT BY ELMO ROPER, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD OF THE FUND FOR THE REPUBLIC, IN INTRODUCING DR. ROBERT M. HUTCHINS AT A DINNER MEETING ON THE AMERICA CHARACTER AT THE SHOREHAM HOTEL, WASHINGTON, D.C., JUNE 1, 1961

And now I should like to introduce a man whose interests have spanned many areas but who has devoted his life to a single faith: faith in human rationality. Faced with overwhelming evidence of man's unreason, he has nevertheless subbornly maintained his belief that man at his best is a wonderful thing, and man at his best is man thinking. Perhaps I should say man speaking, for it is the great dialogue between the best minds of the ages, between the developing minds of today and the great minds of the past, through which Robert Hutchins has always believed human enlightenment will come.

As a corollary to this faith in reason, he has also placed his faith in democracy and in freedom. Only in an atmosphere of freedom, when there are no restrictions on man's inquiring mind and when no sacred body of so-called truth is allowed to block the flow of man's intellectual adventuring, can civilized discourse flourish and rationality be a governing principle in human affairs. So Robert Hutchins has fought for freedom, and for the freedom of all men. Knowing that most journeys into truth have been taken first by lonely, stubborn men, he has upheld the right of lonely, stubborn men everywhere to seek the truth and declare it as it appears to them. His life has been a steadfast dedication to the famous proposition of John Stuart Mill: "If all mankind minus one were of one opinion, and only one person were of the contrary opinion, mankind would be no more justified in silencing that one person, than he, if he had the power, would be justified in silencing mankind."

From time to time there have been those who wished to silence, or at least to tone down, Robert Hutchins, resenting his gadfly probing into the sacred areas of American complacency or shocked at his defense of such dubious documents as the Bill of Rights, but like most gadflies he has persisted in his ways, and I daresay he will be remembered when his critics are forgotten.

The radical concept of education Dr. Hutchins developed as president and then chancellor of the University of Chicago is considered by many the most revolutionary phase of his career. Yet it well may be that the present phase at the Fund for the Republic's center for the study of democratic institutions will ultimately seem even more revolutionary, because in that a man steeped in a tradition of Aristotelian logic, 18th century rationalism and old-fashioned Yankee independence, has undertaken a study of a uniquely modern phenomenon, the impact on freedom of 20th century institutions, with a view to making a reevaluation of the meaning of freedom in contemporary life.

I present to you the president of the Fund for the Republic, Dr. Robert M. Hutchins.

THE CONSTITUTION AND THE POLITICAL COMMUNITY

Our guest of honor accepted our invitation on one condition, and that was that no complimentary remarks should be made about him. Since it is impossible to ignore a guest of honor, I have no course but to make uncomplimentary remarks about him. This I shall do from a deep sense of personal grievance.

When I taught law, we taught that law was what the courts would do. Although there were some progressives who thought that what the courts did was determined by what the judges had for breakfast—tell me what you eat and I'll tell you what you are—the more authoritative view was that the courts would do what they had done. Among other unattractive subjects, I taught the law of public utilities. What the Supreme Court had done, in 1898, was to hold, in Smyth v. Ames, that regulatory bodies could not constitutionally fix rates that did not give a fair return on the fair value of the property, and fair value came to mean cost of reproduction new, less depreciation. My course was based on Smyth v. Ames.

What a bonanza the rule of Smyth v. Ames turned out to be. Almost everybody, except the public, profited by it. When New York City began its rate case against the Edison Co., that corporation's expenditures for appraising, accounting, and legal fees were over $4 million. New York Telephone's, in a similar case, were over $5 million. And in 1932 it appeared that the valuation of the American railroads, which had been going on for 18 years, had cost $178 million.

No sooner had Justice Black got on the Court than he attacked the rule of Smyth v. Ames. Perhaps little more could have been expected of a man who as a Senator had announced that stare decisis, adherence to precedent, did not apply to the Constitution. We took some temporary comfort in the fact that his attack was a dissent. But such was the pertinacity and persuasiveness of our guest of honor that by 1944 he had brought the majority around to his opinion, and Smyth v. Ames was overruled. Thus at one stroke Justice Black hit the utilities, and the appraising, accounting, engineering, and legal professions a tremendous blow in the pocketbook—and repealed everything my students ever knew.

Most of my colleagues of those days will tell you the same story. What Justice Black did to me and my students he did to them and their students. He assailed the rule, unquestioned since 1842, on the interpretation of State law by the Federal courts, and got it overturned in 1938. He inveigled the Court into upsetting an almost equally ancient tradition by holding that insurance was commerce. He seemed to suggest in Marsh v. Alabama, decided in 1945, that corporations, under certain circumstances, might be subject, like governments, to the prohibitions of the Bill of Rights. In the Lovett case he renovated an almost forgotten piece of furniture, the bill of attainder, and turned it into a weapon with which he repulsed a rapacious majority in Congress.

Nor is this all. If we explore the Black country, the world of Justice Black's dissenting opinions, we see that if we lived there we should be living in a different atmosphere. The protections accorded the accused in criminal cases would be extended. Aliens would be treated almost as well as citizens. The protection of the 5th amendment would be broadened. It would be regarded as guaranteeing the right to be silent; the waiver of the privilege would be more narrowly interpreted; and no governmental penalty of any kind could be inflicted on a witness availing himself of it. The immemorial rule permitting the trial of criminal contempts without a jury would be abolished. So would blue-ribbon juries. The rights of labor unions to picket peacefully and to engage in political activity would be widened. No test oaths of any sort would be permitted. Censorship, obscenity legislation, and group libel would be unconstitutional. A corporation would not be a person within the meaning of the 14th amendment, as it has been ever since Roscoe Conkling, by carefully editing history, convinced the Court many years ago. The Federal Government would be held to have completely preempted the field of repressing subversion. The House Un-American Activities Committee would be regarded as an un-American activity. The whole of the Bill of Rights and not just part of it, would operate against the States. The doctrine that the necessities of the community must be balanced against the rights of the citizen, so that the citizen usually loses, would go out the window. Neither subway conductors nor applicants for admission to the bar would be declared unreliable because they refused to answer questions about membership in the Communist Party.

When we recall that all the great movements in constitutional law in the last 75 years have been made by dissenting opinions, we recognize that such opinions are not to be trifled with. We ought to make up our minds whether we like the Black country. We may find ourselves living in it.

I like it. But the question is why. I can't say I like it because I like it. If I did, all anybody else would have to say would be that he didn't like it.

I can't say I like it because I was brought up that way. Too many people were brought up another way.

I can't say I like it because it reflects the consensus in the United States. It probably does not.

I can't say I like it because I think it would work well. Though I have no doubt that what is not true will somehow fail to work, the crucial word is "somehow," which includes "sometime." Life is so complicated, and so short, that I am not sure that I would know whether or not something was working. And what is the standard of working well, and where do I get it?

I can't say I like the Black country because an historical investigation of what the Founding Fathers meant convinces me that they intended us to live there. Such investigations are likely to be as useless as the Court says they were to it in the desegregation decision, or as the Fund for the Republic found they were when it tried to determine the historical origins of the religion clauses of the first amendment. We certainly are not to take the meaning of the fathers at the time they wrote as binding on us today. Only Chief Justice Taney ever did that. Of course in the Dred Scott case he misrepresented the founders. But even if he had told the truth he would not have been using a good method of constitutional interpretation.

I can't say I like the Black country because the precise words of the Constitution compel me to. The plain language of constitutions, statutes, and precedents requires interpretation. The precise words of the religion clauses of the first amendment are as precise as any in the Constitution. The phrase "separation of church and state" does not appear in that document. Still less is there any talk therein of a high and impregnable wall of separation. Yet these phrases are the commonplaces of judicial discussion of the freedom and establishment of religion.

The precise words and plain language of the religion clauses, though very precise and exceedingly plain, were not sufficiently so to produce a line of decision from the Everson case, through the McCollum case, to the Zorach case that was altogether clear to the non-judicial mind. These words and language have not always seemed to be precise and plain even to the judicial mind, as the praiseworthy changes of that mind in the flag-salute cases show.

In 1934, Chief Justice Hughes said, delivering the opinion of the Court, "The vast body of law which has been developed was unknown to the fathers, but it is believed to have preserved the essential content and the spirit of the Constitution * * *. This development is a growth from the seeds which the fathers planted." The Founding Fathers meant us to learn. They meant us to learn how to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquillity, to provide for the common defense, to promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity. They founded a political community; a community learning together to discover and achieve the common good, the elements of which they set forth, but did not elucidate, in the Preamble. The reliance on us to continue learning is evident in every line of the Constitution and in the brevity of the whole.

The Constitution is to be interpreted, therefore, as a charter of learning. We are to learn how to develop the seeds the Fathers planted under the conditions of our own time. This political botany means that nothing we have learned and no process of learning could be unconstitutional. What would be unconstitutional would be limitations or inhibitions on learning. I like the Black country because this is the essential content and spirit of its constitution. Justice Black is a great teacher of the challenges posed in our time by our Constitution to the American character.

Learning is a rational process. Law is an ordinance of reason, directed to the common good. The process of deciding to make or not to make a law, or the process of reaching a judicial conclusion, is to be criticized in terms of its conformity not to local or popular but to universal standards of reasonableness. If the Constitution is to teach us, and we are to learn under its instruction, the dialogue that goes on about its meaning must be about what is reasonable and unreasonable, right and wrong, just and unjust. The question is not what interests are at stake, not what are the mores of the community, not who has the power or who is the dominant group, not what the courts will do or the legislature has done, but what is reasonable, right, and just.

Certainly conformity to the precise words of the laws and the Constitution is not enough. It is well to remember that Hitler was called Adolf Legalité. Everything he did, like everything that is being done in South Africa, was strictly according to law. Critics of President Eisenhower were correct in saying that his defense of the desegregation decision was ineffectual. He should have said not merely that the decision was the law of the land, but also that it was based on reason, right, and justice.

Since, as John Dewey remarked, we have a government of lawyers, and not of men, lawyers should understand that there is or ought to be a normative jurisprudence which prescribes something more than correct procedure. The lamentable state of legal education, admirably exemplified by the way I used to teach public utility law, is one of the principal obstacles to our learning in and through the political community.

There are others. Our ideology, by which I mean that set of ideas which has hardened into a linear series of slogans, one of which leads into the other without the intervention of thought, is far behind the facts of life. Our institutions, operated in terms of that ideology, seem sometimes primitive, sometimes unreal, sometimes fantastic, when we think of the obligations and opportunities of our country in the contemporary world. We know that tremendous changes are going on, and that still greater are impending. Of the two pillars of our society, property and work, the first has now been transformed; it has changed from tangible goods into a series of claims; and the second is certain to disappear. We are going to have to live in a world without work, a world without want, a world without disease, and, if we are to live at all, in a world without war.

With the gross national product hovering around an alltime high, one-third of the productive capacity of our industries lies idle. What are we going to do with our goods? What are we going to do with ourselves? We now have to learn more, and learn it faster, than any other people in history. The time to revive and reconstruct the political community is at hand.

It seems likely that this age will be one either of innovation or of extinction. Without innovation the human race may not be extinguished, though the technical means of achieving this result are now available. What will be extinguished, in the absence of innovation, is the free society, the political community. Only if we can tear ourselves loose from our prejudices, from our ideology, from slogans, only if we can take a fresh look at the world and exercise the same kind of intelligence, character, and inventiveness that the Founding Fathers showed can we hope to revive, reconstruct, and preserve the political community. Take 4 successive days out of the last 10 in the work of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. On the first our staff economist demonstrated that the market was not working and could not work. He then demonstrated with equal clarity that economic planning, the only visible alternative to the market, was not working either. He said it would be necessary to develop new economic ideas and new economic institutions to meet the problems of a totally new world.

On the second day a Canadian expert reporting on experience with broadcasting in Canada and England and his observations elsewhere declared that no form of public, semipublic, or quasi-public control of broadcasting had been able to resist the advertising agencies anywhere and that if they were to be resisted, which he thought essential to the health, morals, and sanity of the world, new ideas would have to appear and new methods be invented.

On the third day a professor from the Australian National University, beginning with a conviction that the United Kingdom would join the European Common Market, and going on to trace the effect of this action on the British Commonwealth, concluded that we were rapidly moving into some form of world political organization, and speculated that, if such an organization was to be in any sense free and democratic, new political forms would have to be developed. Something is going to replace the nation states. But what?

On the fourth day a student of the American character from Berkeley recalled de Tocqueville's remark that the individual is a defaulted citizen, that democracy fosters individualism, and that individualism first saps the virtues of public life and ends in pure selfishness. De Tocqueville said that democracy, by way of individualism, throws every man "back forever upon himself alone and threatens in the end to confine him entirely within the solitude of his own heart." The citizens of the United States, de Tocqueville thought, would escape this fate because our Constitution required us to learn together to seek the common good. We would be forced, he said, by the necessity of cooperating in the management of our free institutions, and by our desire to exercise our political rights, into the habit of attending to the interests of the public.

The student of the American character from Berkeley pointed out that de Tocqueville's expectations had not been fulfilled, that the people of the United States are in fact defaulted citizens, with an indifference and even a hostility to government, politics, and law that would have astounded de Tocqueville—and the Founding Fathers. Instead of being a citizen, the American individual is a consumer, an object of propaganda, and a statistical unit. The conclusion of the professor from Berkeley was that the political community had been wrecked on the rocks of our ideology, by such slogans as free enterprise and that government is best which governs least, and was now extinct. In view of the condition of our education, our mass media, and our political parties, he believed that in the absence of some dramatic new effort to reconstruct our attitudes and our institutions the outlook for democracy, for the free society, and for the political community was hopeless.

All the studies that the center has been carrying on come out at the same place. We are entering a totally new world, and we are not very well prepared for it. The new world is described by the great French historian and philosopher, Étienne Gilson, as follows: "The throes of the contemporary world are those of a birth. And what is being born with such great pain is a universal human society. * * * What characterizes the events we witness, what distinguishes them from all preceding events back to the origins of history is * * * their global character, or to say it perhaps more exactly, their planetary character. The unity of the planet is already accomplished. For reasons economic, industrial, and technical, reasons all linked to the practical applications of science, such a solidarity is established among the peoples of the earth that their vicissitudes are integrated in a universal history of which they are particular moments. * * * These peoples are in fact parts of a humanity * * * something of which they must now become conscious, in order to will it instead of being subject to it, in order to think it with a view to organizing it."

The demands of this new world, like the demands of the political community, are first of all demands that we think, and learn. We face them ill prepared. Our educational system is not unfairly characterized by reference to the course in family living in the high school of Lockport, N.Y. The last unit of this course is called, "How To Be Livable, Lovable, and Datable." Or, as bearing more directly on our topic, you may prefer reference to the Resource Guide for English and Social Studies for the 10th Grade, published by the Pasadena schools. It reads as follows: "In the 10th grade, study is concentrated on the growth of democracy, and especially on the form of government which developed. Such a study should be brief and to the point, in order to allow time for the unit on driver education."

I remind you that on April 14 the superintendent of schools of New York City announced that 10,000 seventh-graders under his jurisdiction could not read third-grade books. The education of adults, which might be the answer to the question: What shall we do with ourselves? is in a deplorable state. Thirty million Americans, for example, are without any library service whatever.

We have triumphantly invented, perfected, and distributed to the humblest cottage throughout the land one of the greatest technical marvels in history, television, and have used it for what? To bring Coney Island into every home. It is as though movable type had been devoted exclusively since Gutenberg's time to the publication of comic books. William Berkeley, Governor of Virginia in the 17th century, said, "Thank God there are no free schools or printing, for learning has brought disobedience and heresy into the world, and printing has divulged them. God keep us from both." We are combining Berkeley's ideal of no communications at all with the democratic ideal of communications for everybody by having mass communications without content. In the same way it sometimes seems as though we are trying to combine this ideal of no schools at all with the democratic ideal of schools for everybody by having schools without education.

When it comes to learning through the political community, the object is to learn how to be a responsible citizen, enjoying liberty under law. The freedom of the individual must be protected, but in addition the citizen must grow in responsibility if our country is to become conscious of itself as a part of humanity and to think humanity in order to organize it. Individual freedom and liberty under law are not incompatible, and they are both indispensable.

Law is a great teacher. It does not represent that minimum of morality necessary to hold the community together. It stands rather for such moral truth as the community has discovered that can and should be supported by the authority of the community. The conception of law as coercion, or the command of the sovereign, or the expression of power, or what the courts will do leads to the conclusion that every effort should be made to avoid law and that it is proper to do anything that nobody can compel you to abstain from doing. Some such misconception must have been in the mind of our Government when it organized a foray into Cuba in violation of our own laws and in violation of international law. This fiasco suggests either that our officials are hypocritical when they make obeisance to the rule of law or that when they use the words "rule of law" they do not know what they are talking about.

Some of the principles of world law are of great antiquity. Others are gradually emerging. Justice Black referred to them in 1941 in the submerged land cases and again in 1946 when he said that "there has grown up in the field of international relations a body of customs defining with more or less certainty the duties owing by all nations to alien residents." The principles of world law are the principles of thinking humanity in order to organize it. Of necessity they must be principles of universal validity. I think they will be found to be the principles embodied in the preamble to the Constitution of the United States.

We must revive and reconstruct the political community in the United States because the task before us is nothing less than the organization of the world political community. We have thought that we had hold on some truths that would mean something in the universal history of mankind. The Founding Fathers believed that the truths in which America was conceived would stir the aspirations of all men everywhere. If we are now to exemplify these truths, we have to keep hold on them; we have to keep learning them; we have to learn all they can imply for today and tomorrow. The proposition to which the Declaration of Independence and Abraham Lincoln dedicated us now extends to the whole world. Once more Americans, on a new scale, have the duty of forming a more perfect union, which will involve establishing justice, promoting the general welfare, and securing the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to all the peoples of the earth.

RESPONSE OF JUSTICE BLACK TO DR. HUTCHINS

Mr. ROPER. I would like to ask Justice Black to stand up so that we can all pay our respects to him directly. Justice Black. [Applause, audience rising.]

Justice BLACK. I like that introduction. It is better than the one that makes you feel that you don't know yourself as well as you thought you did. I like it because it is very much like Mark Twain's—his favorite—and I can think of no better one, because it is very short.

A man was called on to introduce him who had never seen him. Didn't know anything about him. The man said: "I have been asked to introduce the speaker of the evening. There are only two things I know about him. One is that he has never been in the penitentiary, and the other is I cannot imagine why."

That has always seemed to me like a better introduction than one that lasts about 15 minutes, preaching at your funeral. I am very happy to be here. I came not to talk, but to listen.

I wanted to sit at the feet of a man whom I have admired for many, many years, a man who in my judgment has contributed far more to the ideas of liberty than I have. When I first heard about him he was making people think. When I next heard about him he was still making people think. Tonight you have heard him, and he has made you think. What greater service can a man live—perform—in a world that depends more than anything else upon what people think, far more in my judgment than what people do.

It is because he told me—or I was told—that this meeting was to be dedicated largely to the idea of liberty, the idea of freedom, the idea of expanding freedom in this country, that I was happy to come to the gathering. As I have looked around tonight from the time I entered the door until now, I have looked into the faces of men and women who have been contributing and are now contributing very greatly to the basic ideas of a free democratic country. Such men and women will continue to do what Dr. Hutchins said that the Founding Fathers hoped this Nation would do—to practice a type of government and to utter thoughts of freedom that would be an inspiration to the people of the world.

I thank all of you for coming here, to hear Dr. Hutchins and Dr. Niebuhr. I must confess that Dr. Niebuhr disturbed me once or twice. [Laughter.] He mentioned a name that I have somehow become familiar with the last few years. I don't know exactly how to pronounce it, but it is something like Gunnar Myrdal, I believe he said. [Laughter.]

Again he disturbed me a little because he said—didn't disturb me, he gave me hope, he said that the foundation (the Fund for the Republic) had decided that the thing to do was to get people together with different ideas and let them fight it out among themselves. That disturbed me a little because I belong to two or three organizations where numbers of the people have different ideas and I do not want them to be inspired into fighting it out any more than they do. [Laughter. Applause.] But it is a grand fight I can assure you. [Laughter and applause.]

And I want to correct one idea that seems to have spread abroad. I had a letter a few days ago from a fan, not on my side [laughter] but this fan suggested, in a way, that these ideas might be beyond my comprehension—as a matter of fact it was suggested that they probably were—but that if I would be kind enough, if it was possible for me to do so, to pass them on to my brethren on the Court they would appreciate it [laughter].

I want to assure you it was no difficulty at all to pass them on to my brethren. The Supreme Court does have its differences. I hope it will always have. It does have men who express their differences. I hope it will always have, because I fully subscribe to the belief that there is no progress possible anywhere where the differences of people are stifled, their voices are not able to be heard, and where they all speak as one voice, when all of us know that human beings don't feel that way.

Dr. Hutchins, I appreciate the honor of being with you. I wish I could say just how much I know has been done for the cause of liberty in this country by many people I see before me, far more than I have or can. I have sat at the feet not merely of you tonight but I have sat at the feet of some of these people here. It is grand to be with you. It is grand to be a part of what I have come to believe in 24 years time is the greatest stabilizing force, a great stabilizing force for this Nation. To a large extent the Supreme Court represents the difference between the country that must depend upon the guns flashing to get rid of tyranny, and a country that depends upon its people, their institutions, with open minds and open hearts. I am proud to have served as a part of this Government, the time I have.

This is more than I intended to say, more than I should have said. I have no pessimism for the future, however, I should say. I'm not even afraid for people to think. I'm not even afraid for them to talk. With the stubborn men I have had to come in contact with all my life that I couldn't convert, I'm not afraid of people with silly ideas converting the people of this country to depart from the good solid faith of a great democratic nation. [Applause, the audience rising.]

CENTER FOR THE STUDY OF DEMOCRATIC INSTITUTIONS

The twelfth number of a periodical bulletin issued to promote discussion of significant issues involved in the maintenance of a free society; and sometimes to describe the purposes and operations of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions of the Fund for the Republic as an educational institution in this field.

Caught on the Horn of Plenty

W. H. FERRY Vice-President of The Fund for the Republic, Inc.; Staff Director of the Center's Study of the Economic Order

The United States is advancing rapidly into a national economy in which there will not be enough jobs of the conventional kind to go around. The acceleration of technology is responsible. A social and political crisis will be the result. Substitutes for such presently accepted goals as full employment will have to be found. Fresh definitions of the conceptions of work, leisure, abundance, and scarcity are needed. Economic theories adequate to an industrial revolution are not good enough for the conditions of the scientific revolution. ⁂ The complexity and interdependence of the scientific-industrial state calls for national planning. The individualism of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is a casualty of technology, as are old theories of private property. Government must intervene more and more in the nation's industrial life. The destiny is the economy under law. A radical change in public attitude toward law and government is necessary if the general welfare is to be achieved. ⁂ Having bargained for the benefits of technology on all fronts, law is our only means of assuring that it serves the common good.

THE ECONOMICS OF EQUALITY

Tom Kahn

League for Industrial Democracy

[Excerpted from the monograph, The Economics of Equality by Tom Kahn (New York, 1964) by permission from the League for Industiral Democracy.]

The relative economic position of the Negro is declining. In part this is due to overt racial discrimination, but mainly to his membership in an economic class to which he has been bound by centuries of exploitation. The position of this class is deteriorating because of technological developments which are revolutionizing the structure of the labor force. More precisely, it results from the failure to evolve sweeping national policies to meet the economic and social problems thrown up by the technological revolution. Since the economic future of the Negro is inseparable from that of his economic class, the civil rights movement must mobilize behind radical programs for the abolition of poverty and unemployment, thus infusing "the other America" with the dynamic and spirit of the Negro revolt. Failing this, persistent economic inequalities will undermine the drive toward legal and social equality.

The Treadmill

Running fast to stand still is essentially the position in which the Negro finds himself today. If the segregated lunch-counter is a hollow relic of the ancient régime, one which would inevitably topple at an early stage in the civil rights revolution, the more fundamental, institutional forms of discrimination are more securely rooted in our economic system. And current trends in that system imperil the Negro's economic future.

What emerges from the statistics on jobs and income are the following trends:

1. There is a widening dollar gap between Negroes and whites.

2. The relative income gap between Negroes and whites has remained virtually constant over the past decade.

3. The unemployment gap between Negroes and whites has been widening.

4. The industries and occupations where the Negro made his greatest gains have either declined or shown relatively little growth over the past decade.

5. Negroes constitute a growing percentage of all workers in most of the declining job categories.

Widening Dollar Gap

The median Negro family income is $3,233, or 54% of the white family's $5,835. Approximately two out of every three Negro families subsist on less than $4,000 annually-and are therefore poor or deprived-as compared with 27.7% of the white families. Only one out of five Negro families earns $6,000 or more, as compared with one out of two white families. In the whole country there are only 6,000 Negro families that can boast of incomes of $25,000 or more.

These figures tell us where the Negro is today, but they become more meaningful when compared to the 1945 figures, as Table 1 shows.

Notice that between 1945 and 1961, the percentage ratio of whites who escaped from the below $4,000 category (63.3%) is almost double that for Negroes (33.1%), despite the fact that a larger percentage of Negroes were in that category in 1945 (90.1% as against 75.5% of white families). Similarly, whites entered the $6,000-and-over category at a faster rate than Negroes.

On the other hand, the percentage increase of Negro families entering the $4,000-$5,999 category seems very impressive when compared with the figures for whites. But the percentage gain is great only because the starting figure was so low.

Fisk economist Vivian Henderson emphasizes that while > relative growth in wage and salary income of Negroes since 1940 has been greater than that of whites. . . the absolute, or dollar, difference has widened considerably. . . . People spend and save dollars. It is this dollar difference that counts. Pronouncements regarding economic progress which are confined to acceleration concepts and percentage change obscure the real predicament-Negroes are losing ground rapidly in gaining dollar parity with whites. The "dollar gap" at a faster pace than for Negroes. [The Economic Status of Negroes, Southern Regional Council, pp. 12-13.]

One aspect of the earning gap is particularly astonishing. When we compare the lifetime earnings of Negro and white males by education (Table 2) we find that the Negro who finishes four years of college will earn less than a white with only eight years of elementary school.

Relative Income Gap

Not only is the dollar gap widening, but the relative income gap has remained virtually constant for almost a decade. While the figures reported by statisticians vary slightly, they point to the conclusion of Herman P. Miller of the Census Bureau.

In the last decade. . .there has been no change in income differential between [Negroes and whites]. The median pay of the Negro worker has remained stuck at about 55% of the white [N.Y. Times, Aug. 12, 1963].

The Negro's relative income gains were actually registered between 1940 and 1954, when Negro family median income jumped from 37% to 56% of the white figure.

A Letter

The following letter was sent on March 22 by The Ad Hoc Committee on the Triple Revolution to President Lyndon B. Johnson. The White House reply from Mr. Lee White, Assistant Special Counsel to the President, was received shortly. The letter to the President, together with the Report, was also sent to the Majority and Minority leaders of the Senate and the House of Representatives and to the Secretary of Labor. Texts follow:

March 22, 1964

Dear Mr. President:

We enclose a memorandum, The Triple Revolution, for your consideration. This memorandum was prepared out of a feeling of foreboding about the nation's future. The men and women whose names are signed to it think that neither Americans nor their leaders are aware of the magnitude and acceleration of the changes going on around them. These changes, economic, military, and social, comprise The Triple Revolution. We believe that these changes will compel, in the very near future and whether we like it or not, public measures that move radically beyond any steps now proposed or contemplated.

We commend the spirit prompting the War on Poverty recently announced, and the new commissions on economic dislocation and automation. With deference, this memorandum sets forth the historical and technological reasons why such tactics seem bound to fall short. Radically new circumstances demand radically new strategies.

If policies such as those suggested in The Triple Revolution are not adopted we believe that the nation will be thrown into unprecedented economic and social disorder. Our statement is aimed at showing why drastic changes in our economic organization are occurring, their relation to the growing movement for full rights for Negroes, and the minimal public and private measures that appear to us to be required.

THE WHITE HOUSE

WASHINGTON

April 6, 1964

Dear Mr. Ferry:

The President has asked me to thank you for your letter of March 19, in which you enclose the memorandum, The Triple Revolution, drawn up by your Committee.

In recent months the President has taken a number of steps addressed to the problems discussed in your memorandum — poverty, unemployment, and technological change. He has committed this Administration to an unrelenting war on poverty and, as you are of course aware, has submitted to the Congress major new legislation requesting the necessary weapons for the prosecution of this war. On December 21 he established the Committee on Economic Impact of Defense and Disarmament. The Committee will provide central review and coordination of activities in the Executive branch designed to improve our understanding of the economic impact of changes in defense expenditures. The President has also asked the Congress to establish a Presidential commission to study the impact of technological change on the economy and to recommend measures for assuring the full benefits of technology while minimizing any adverse effects.

Rapid advances in technology and sharp changes in the direction and location of economic activity pose both challenges and problems for the Nation. Your Committee has clearly been willing to take a completely fresh look at these matters. You may be sure that the Committee's analysis and recommendations will be given thoughtful consideration by all of those in the Executive branch who are concerned with these problems.

Sincerely,

s/ Lee C. White

THE TRIPLE REVOLUTION

This statement is written in the recognition that mankind is at a historic conjuncture which demands a fundamental reexamination of existing values and institutions. At this time three separate and mutually reinforcing revolutions are taking place:

The Cybernation Revolution: A new era of production has begun. Its principles of organization are as different from those of the industrial era as those of the industrial era were different from the agricultural. The cybernation revolution has been brought about by the combination of the computer and the automated self-regulating machine. This results in a system of almost unlimited productive capacity which requires progressively less human labor. Cybernation is already reorganizing the economic and social system to meet its own needs.

The Weaponry Revolution: New forms of weaponry have been developed which cannot win wars but which can obliterate civilization. We are recognizing only now that the great weapons have eliminated war as a method for resolving international conflicts. The ever-present threat of total destruction is tempered by the knowledge of the final futility of war. The need of a "warless world" is generally recognized, though achieving it will be a long and frustrating process.

The Human Rights Revolution: A universal demand for full human rights is now clearly evident. It continues to be demonstrated in the civil rights movement within the United States. But this is only the local manifestation of a worldwide movement toward the establishment of social and political regimes in which every individual will feel valued and none will feel rejected on account of his race.

■ We are particularly concerned in this statement with the first of these revolutionary phenomena. This is not because we underestimate the significance of the other two. On the contrary, we affirm that it is the simultaneous occurrence and interaction of all three developments which make evident the necessity for radical alterations in attitude and policy. The adoption of just policies for coping with cybernation and for extending rights to all Americans is indispensable to the creation of an atmosphere in the U.S. in which the supreme issue, peace, can be reasonably debated and resolved.

The Negro claims, as a matter of simple justice, his full share in America's economic and social life. He sees adequate employment opportunities as a chief means of attaining this goal: The March on Washington demanded freedom and jobs. The Negro's claim to a job is not being met. Negroes are the hardest-hit of the many groups being exiled from the economy by cybernation. Negro unemployment rates cannot be expected to drop substantially. Promises of jobs are a cruel and dangerous hoax on hundreds of thousands of Negroes and whites alike who are especially vulnerable to cybernation because of age or inadequate education.

The demand of the civil rights movement cannot be fulfilled within the present context of society. The Negro is trying to enter a social community and a tradition of work-and-income which are in the process of vanishing even for the hitherto privileged white worker. Jobs are disappearing under the impact of highly efficient, progressively less costly machines.

■ The U.S. operates on the thesis, set out in the Employment Act of 1964, that every person will be able to obtain a job if he wishes to do so and that this job will provide him with resources adequate to live and maintain a family decently. Thus job-which economic resources are distributed.
holding is the general mechanism through
Those without work have access only to a minimal income, hardly sufficient to provide the necessities of life, and enabling those receiving it to function as only "minimum consumers." As a result, the goods and services which are needed by these crippled consumers, and which they would buy if they could, are not produced.

This in turn deprives other workers of jobs, thus reducing their incomes and consumption.

Present excessive levels of unemployment would be multiplied several times if military and space expenditures did not continue to absorb 10% of the gross national product (i.e., the total goods and services produced). Some 6 to 8 million people are employed as a direct result of purchases for space and military activities. At least an equal number hold their jobs as an indirect result of military or space expenditures. In recent years, the military and space budgets have absorbed a rising proportion of national production and formed a strong support for the economy.

However, these expenditures are coming in for more and more criticism, at least partially in recognition of the fact that nuclear weapons have eliminated war as an acceptable method for resolving international conflicts. Early in 1964 President Johnson ordered a curtailment of certain military expenditures. Defense Secretary McNamara is closing shipyards, airfields, and Army bases, and Congress is pressing the National Space Administration to economize. The future of these strong props to the economy is not as clear today as it was even a year ago.

How the Cybernation Revolution Shapes Up

Cybernation is manifesting the characteristics of a revolution in production. These include the development of radically different techniques and the subsequent appearance of novel principles of the organization of production; a basic reordering of man's relationship to his environment; and a dramatic increase in total available and potential energy.

The major difference between the agricultural, industrial and cybernation revolutions is the speed at which they developed. The agricultural revolution began several thousand years ago in the Middle East. Centuries passed in the shift from a subsistence base of hunting and food-gathering to settled agriculture.

In contrast, it has been less than 200 years since the emergence of the industrial revolution, and direct and accurate knowledge of the new productive techniques has reached most of mankind. This swift dissemination of information is generally held to be the main factor leading to widespread industrialization.

While the major aspects of the cybernation revolution are for the moment restricted to the U.S., its effects are observable almost at once throughout the industrial world and large parts of the non-industrial world. Observation is rapidly followed by analysis and criticism. The problems posed by the cybernation revolution are part of a new era in the history of all mankind but they are first being faced by the people of the U.S. The way Americans cope with cybernation will influence the course of this phenomenon everywhere. This country is the stage on which the machines-and-man drama will first be played for the world to witness.

The fundamental problem posed by the cybernation revolution in the U.S. is that it invalidates the general mechanism so far employed to undergird people's rights as consumers. Up to this time economic resources have been distributed on the basis of contributions to production, with machines and men competing for employment on somewhat equal terms. In the developing cybernated system, potentially unlimited output can be achieved by systems of machines which will require little cooperation from human beings. As machines take over production from men, they absorb an increasing proportion of resources while the men who are displaced become dependent on minimal and unrelated government measures—unemployment insurance, social security, welfare payments.

These measures are less and less able to disguise a historic paradox: That a substantial proportion of the population is subsisting on minimal incomes, often below the poverty line, at a time when sufficient productive potential is available to supply the needs of everyone in the U.S.

Industrial System Fails to Provide for Abolition of Poverty

The existence of this paradox is denied or ignored by conventional economic analysis. The general economic approach argues that potential demand, which if filled would raise the number of jobs and provide incomes to those holding them, is underestimated. Most contemporary economic analysis states that all of the available labor force and industrial capacity is required to meet the needs of consumers and industry and to provide adequate public services: Schools, parks, roads, homes, decent cities, and clean water and air. It is further argued that demand could be increased, by a variety of standard techniques, to any desired extent by providing money and machines to improve the conditions of the billions of impoverished people elsewhere in the world, who need food and shelter, clothes and machinery and everything else the industrial nations take for granted.

There is no question that cybernation does increase the potential for the provision of funds to neglected public sectors. Nor is there any question that cybernation would make possible the abolition of poverty at home and abroad. But the industrial system does not possess any adequate mechanisms to permit these potentials to become realities. The industrial system was designed to produce an ever-increasing quantity of goods as efficiently as possible, and it was assumed that the distribution of the power to purchase these goods would occur almost automatically. The continuance of the income-through-jobs link as the only major mechanism for distributing effective demand—for granting the right to consume—now acts as the main brake on the almost unlimited capacity of a cybernated productive system.

▪ Recent administrations have proposed measures aimed at achieving a better distribution of resources, and at reducing unemployment and underemployment. A few of these proposals have been enacted. More often they have failed to secure congressional support. In every case, many members of Congress have criticized the proposed measures as departing from traditional principles for the allocation of resources and the encouragement of production. Abetted by budget-balancing economists and interest groups they have argued for the maintenance of an economic machine based on ideas of scarcity to deal with the facts of abundance produced by cybernation. This time-consuming criticism has slowed the workings of Congress and has thrown out of focus for that body the inter-related effects of the triple revolution.

An adequate distribution of the potential abundance of goods and services will be achieved only when it is understood that the major economic problem is not how to increase production but how to distribute the abundance that is the great potential of cybernation. There is an urgent need for a fundamental change in the mechanisms employed to insure consumer rights.

Facts and Figures of the Cybernation Revolution

No responsible observer would attempt to describe the exact pace or the full sweep of a phenomenon that is developing with the speed of cybernation. Some aspects of this revolution, however, are already clear:

- The rate of productivity increase has risen with the onset of cybernation.
- An industrial economic system postulated on scarcity has been unable to distribute the abundant goods and services produced by a cybernated system or potential in it.
- Surplus capacity and unemployment have thus co-existed at excessive levels over the last six years.
- The underlying cause of excessive unemployment is the fact that the capability of machines is rising more rapidly than the capacity of many human beings to keep pace.
- A permanent impoverished and jobless class is established in the midst of potential abundance.

▪ Evidence for these statements follows:

1. The increased efficiency of machine systems is shown in the more rapid increase in productivity per man-hour since 1960, a year that marks the first visible upsurge of the cybernation revolution. In 1961, 1962 and 1963, productivity per man-hour rose at an average pace above 3.5%—a rate well above both the historical average and the postwar rate.

Companies are finding cybernation more and more attractive. Even at the present early stage of cybernation, costs have already been lowered to a point where the price of a durable machine may be as little as one-third of the current annual wage-cost of the worker it replaces. A more rapid rise in the rate of productivity increase per man-hour can be expected from now on.

2. In recent years it has proved to increase demand fast enough to bring about the full use of either men or plant capacities. The task of developing sufficient additional demand promises to become more difficult each year. A $30 billion annual increase in gross national product is now required to prevent unemployment rates from rising. An additional $40 to $60 billion increase would be required to bring unemployment rates down to an acceptable level.

3. The official rate of unemployment has remained at or above 5.5% during the Sixties. The unemployment rate for teen agers has been rising steadily and now stands around 15%. The unemployment rate for Negro teen agers stands about 30%. The unemployment rate for teen agers in minority ghettoes sometimes exceeds 50%. Unemployment rates for Negroes are regularly more than twice those for whites, whatever their occupation, educational level, age or sex. The unemployment position for other racial minorities is similarly unfavorable. Unemployment rates in depressed areas often exceed 50%.

Unemployment Is Far Worse Than Figures Indicate

These official figures seriously underestimate the true extent of unemployment. The statistics take no notice of underemployment or featherbedding. Besides the 5.5% of the labor force who are officially designated as unemployed, nearly 4% of the labor force sought full-time work in 1962 but could find only parttime jobs. In addition, methods of calculating unemployment rates—a person is counted as unemployed only if he has actively sought a job recently—ignore the fact that many men and women who would like to find jobs have not looked for them because they know there are no employment opportunities.

Underestimates for this reason are pervasive among groups whose unemployment rates are high—the young, the old, and racial minorities. Many people in the depressed agricultural, mining and industrial areas, who by official definition hold jobs but who are actually grossly underemployed, would move if there were prospects of finding work elsewhere. It is reasonable to estimate that over 8,000,000 people are not working who would like to have jobs today as compared with the 4,000,000 shown in official statistics.

Even more serious is the fact that the number of people who have voluntarily removed themselves from the labor force is not constant but increases continuously. These people have decided to stop looking for employment and seem to have accepted the fact that they will never hold jobs again. This decision is largely irreversible, in economic and also in social and psychological terms. The older worker calls himself "retired"; he cannot accept work without affecting his social security status. The worker in his prime years is forced onto relief: In most states the requirements for becoming a relief recipient bring about such fundamental alterations in an individual's situation that a reversal of the process is always difficult and often totally infeasible. Teen agers, especially "drop-outs" and Negroes, are coming to realize that there is no place for them in the labor force but at the same time they are given no realistic alternative. These people and their dependents make up a large part of the "poverty" sector of the American population.

Statistical evidence of these trends appears in the decline in the proportion of people claiming to be in the labor force—the so-called labor force participation rate. The recent apparent stabilization of the unemployment rate around 5.5% is therefore misleading: It is a reflection of the discouragement and defeat of people who cannot find employment and have withdrawn from the market rather than a measure of the economy's success in creating jobs for those who want to work.

4. An efficiently functioning industrial system is assumed to provide the great majority of new jobs through the expansion of the private enterprise sector. But well over half of the new jobs created during 1957-1962 were in the public sector —predominantly in teaching. Job creation in the private sector has now almost entirely ceased except in services; of the 4,-300,000 jobs created in this period, only about 200,000 were provided by private industry through its own efforts. Many authorities anticipate that the application of cybernation to certain service industries, which is only just beginning, will be particularly effective. If this is the case, no significant job creation will take place in the private sector in coming years.

5. Cybernation raises the level of the skills of the machine. Secretary of Labor Wirtz has recently stated that the machines being produced today have, on the average, skills equivalent to a high school diploma. If a human being is to compete with such machines, therefore, he must at least possess a high school diploma. The Department of Labor estimates, however, that on the basis of present trends, as many as 30% of all students will be high school drop-outs in this decade.

6. A permanently depressed class is developing in the U.S. Some 38,000,000 Americans, almost one-fifth of the nation, still live in poverty. The percentage of total income received by the poorest 20% of the population was 4.9% in 1944 and 4.7% in 1963.

■ Secretary Wirtz recently summarized these trends. "The confluence of surging population and driving technology is splitting the American labor force into tens of millions of 'have's' and millions of 'have-nots.' In our economy of 69,000,000 jobs, those with wanted skills enjoy opportunity and earning power. But the others face a new and stark problem—exclusion on a permanent basis, both as producers and consumers, from economic life. This division of people threatens to create a human slag heap. We cannot tolerate the development of a separate nation of the poor, the unskilled, the jobless, living within another nation of the well-off, the trained and the employed."

New Consensus Needed

The stubbornness and novelty of the situation that is conveyed by these statistics is now generally accepted. Ironically, it continues to be assumed that it is possible to devise measures which will reduce unemployment to a minimum and thus preserve the over-all viability of the present productive system. Some authorities have gone so far as to suggest that the pace of technological change should be slowed down "so as to allow the industrial productive system time to adapt."

We believe, on the contrary, that the industrial productive system is no longer viable. We assert that the only way to turn technological change to the benefit of the individual and the service of the general welfare is to accept the process and to utilize it rationally and humanely. The new science of political economy will be built on the encouragement and planned expansion of cybernation. The issues raised by cybernation are particularly amenable to intelligent policy-making: Cybernation itself provides the resources and tools that are needed to ensure minimum hardship during the transition process.

■ But major changes must be made in our attitudes and institutions in the foreseeable future. Today Americans are being swept along by three simultaneous revolutions while assuming they have them under control. In the absence of real understanding of any of these phenomena, especially of technology, we may be allowing an efficient and dehumanized community to emerge by default. Gaining control of our future requires the conscious formation of the society we wish to have. Cybernation at last forces us to answer the historic questions: What is man's role when he is not dependent upon his own activities for the material basis of his life? What should be the basis for distributing individual access to national resources? Are there other proper claims on goods and services besides a job?

■ Because of cybernation, society no longer needs to impose repetitive and meaningless (because unnecessary) toil upon the individual. Society can now set the citizen free to make his own choice of occupation and vocation from a wide range of activities not now fostered by our value system" and our accepted modes of "work." But in the absence of such a new consensus about cybernation, the nation cannot begin to take advantage of all that it promises for human betterment.

Proposal for Action

As a first step to a new consensus it is essential to recognize that the traditional link between jobs and incomes is being broken. The economy of abundance can sustain all citizens in comfort and economic security whether or not they engage in what is commonly reckoned as work. Wealth produced by machines rather than by men is still wealth. We urge, therefore, that society, through its appropriate legal and governmental institutions, undertake an unqualified commitment to provide every individual and every family with an adequate income as a matter of right.

▪ This undertaking we consider to be essential to the emerging economic, social and political order in this country. We regard it as the only policy by which the quarter of the nation now dispossessed and soon-to-be dispossessed by lack of employment can be brought within the abundant society. The unqualified right to an income would take the place of the patchwork of welfare measures—from unemployment insurance to relief—designed to ensure that no citizen or resident of the U. S. actually starves.

We do not pretend to visualize all of the consequences of this change in our values. It is clear, however, that the distribution of abundance in a cybernated society must be based on criteria strikingly different from those of an economic system based on scarcity. In retrospect, the establishment of the right to an income will prove to have been only the first step in the reconstruction of the value system of our society brought on by the triple revolution.

▪ The present system encourages activities which can lead to private profit and neglects those activities which can enhance the wealth and the quality of life of our society. Consequently, national policy has hitherto been aimed far more at the welfare of the productive process than at the welfare of people. The era of cybernation can reverse this emphasis. With public policy and research concentrated on people rather than processes we believe that many creative activities and interests commonly thought of as non-economic will absorb the time and the commitment of many of those no longer needed to produce goods and services.

Society as a whole must encourage new modes of constructive, rewarding and ennobling activity. Principal among these are activities such as teaching and learning that relate people to people rather than people to things. Education has never been primarily conducted for profit in our society; it represents the first and most obvious activity inviting the expansion of the public sector to meet the needs of this period of transition.

▪ We are not able to predict the long-run patterns of human activity and commitment in a nation when fewer and fewer people are involved in production of goods and services, nor are we able to forecast the over-all patterns of income distribution that will replace those of the past full employment system. However, these are not speculative and fanciful matters to be contemplated at leisure for a society that may come into existence in three or four generations. The outlines of the future press sharply into the present. The problems of joblessness, inadequate incomes, and frustrated lives confront us now; the American Negro, in his rebellion, asserts the demands—and the rights—of all the disadvantaged. The Negro's is the most insistent voice today, but behind him stand the millions of impoverished who are beginning to understand that cybernation, properly understood and used, is the road out of want and toward a decent life.

*The Transition

We recognize that the drastic alternations in circumstances and in our way of life ushered in by cybernation and the economy of abundance will not be completed overnight. Left to the ordinary forces of the market such change, however, will involve physical and psychological misery and perhaps political chaos. Such misery is already clearly evident among the unemployed, among relief clients into the third generation and more and more among the young and the old for whom society appears to hold no promise of dignified or even stable lives. We must develop programs for this transition designed to give hope to the dispossessed and those cast out by the economic system, and to provide a basis for the rallying of people to bring about those changes in political and social institutions which are essential to the age of technology.

The program here suggested is not intended to be inclusive but rather to indicate its necessary scope. We propose:

1. A massive program to build up our educational system, designed especially with the needs of the chronically undereducated in mind. We estimate that tens of thousands of employment opportunities in such areas as teaching and research and development, particularly for younger people, may be thus created. Federal programs looking to the training of an additional 100,000 teachers annually are needed.

2. Massive public works. The need is to develop and put into effect programs of public works to construct dams, reservoirs, ports, water and air pollution facilities, community recreation facilities. We estimate that for each $1 billion per year spent on public works 150,000 to 200,000 jobs would be created. $2 billion or more a year should be spent in this way, preferably as matching funds aimed at the relief of economically distressed or dislocated areas.

3. A massive program of low-cost housing, to be built both publicly and privately, and aimed at a rate of 700,000-1,000,000 units a year.

4. Development and financing of rapid transit systems, urban and interurban; and other programs to cope with the spreading problems of the great metropolitan centers.

5. A public power system built on the abundance of coal in distressed areas, designed for low-cost power to heavy industrial and residential sections.

6. Rehabilitation of obsolete military bases for community or educational use.

7. A major revision of our tax structure aimed at redistributing income as well as apportioning the costs of the transition period equitably. To this end an expansion of the use of excess profits tax would be important. Subsidies and tax credit plans are required to ease the human suffering involved in the transition of many industries from man power to machine power.

8. The trade unions can play an important and significant role in this period in a number of ways:

a. Use of collective bargaining to negotiate not only for people at work but also for those thrown out of work by technological change.

b. Bargaining for perquisites such as housing, recreational facilities, and similar programs as they have negotiated health and welfare programs.

c. Obtaining a voice in the investment of the unions' huge pension and welfare funds, and insisting on investment policies which have as their major criteria the social use and function of the enterprise in which the investment is made.

d. Organization of the unemployed so that these voiceless people may once more be given a voice in their own economic destinies, and strengthening of the campaigns to organize white-collar and professional workers.

9. The use of the licensing power of government to regulate the speed and direction of cybernation to minimize hardship; and the use of minimum wage power as well as taxing powers to provide the incentives for moving as rapidly as possible toward the goals indicated by this paper.

■ These suggestions are in no way intended to be complete or definitively formulated. They contemplate expenditures of several billions more each year than are now being spent for socially rewarding enter-

*This view of the transitional period is not shared by all the signers. Robert Theobald and James Boggs hold that the two major principles of the transitional period will be (1) that machines rather than men will take up new conventional work openings and (2) that the activity of men will be directed to new forms of "work" and "leisure." Therefore, in their opinion, the specific proposals outlined in this section are more suitable for meeting the problems of the scarcity-economic system than for advancing through the period of transition into the period of abundance.

prises, and a larger role for the government in the economy than it has now or has been given except in times of crisis. In our opinion, this is a time of crisis, the crisis of a triple revolution. Public philosophy for the transition must rest on the conviction that our economic, social and political institutions exist for the use of man and that man does not exist to maintain a particular economic system. This philosophy centers on an understanding that governments are instituted among men for the purpose of making possible life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness and that government should be a creative and positive instrument toward these ends.

Change Must Be Managed

The historic discovery of the post-World War II years is that the economic destiny of the nation can be managed. Since the debate over the Employment Act of 1946 it has been increasingly understood that the federal government bears primary responsibility for the economic and social well-being of the country. The essence of management is planning. The democratic requirement is planning by public bodies for the general welfare. Planning by private bodies such as corporations for their own welfare does not automatically result in additions to the general welfare, as the impact of cybernation on jobs has already made clear.

The hardships imposed by sudden changes in technology have been acknowledged by Congress in proposals for dealing with the long and short-run "dislocations," in legislation for depressed and "impacted" areas, retraining of workers replaced by machines, and the like. The measures so far proposed have not been "transitional" in conception. Perhaps for this reason they have had little effect on the situations they were designed to alleviate. But the primary weakness of this legislation is not ineffectiveness but incoherence. In no way can these disconnected measures be seen as a plan for remedying deep ailments but only, so to speak, as the superficial treatment of surface wounds.

Planning agencies should constitute the network through which pass the stated needs of the people at every level of society, gradually building into a national inventory of human requirements, arrived at by democratic debate of elected representatives.

■ The primary tasks of the appropriate planning institutions should be:

- To collect the data necessary to appaise the effects, social and economic, of cybernation at different rates of innovation.
- To recommend ways, by public and private initiative, of encouraging and sitmulating cybernation.
- To work toward optimal allocations of human and natural resources in meeting the requirements of society.
- To develop ways to smooth the transition from a society in which the norm is full employment within an economic system based on scarcity, to one in which the norm will be either non-employment, in the traditional sense of productive work, or employment on the great variety of socially valuable but "non-productive" tasks made possible by an economy of abundance; to bring about the conditions in which men and women no longer needed to produce goods and services may find their way to a variety of self-fulfilling and socially useful occupations.
- To work out alternatives to defense and related spending that will commend themselves to citizens, entrepreneurs and workers as a more reasonable use of common resources.
- To integrate domestic and international planning. The technological revolution has related virtually every major domestic problem to a world problem. The vast inequities between the industrialized and the underdeveloped countries cannot long be sustained.

■ The aim throughout will be the conscious and rational direction of economic life by planning institutions under democratic control.

In this changed framework the new planning institutions will operate at every level of government—local, regional and federal—and will be organized to elicit democratic participation in all their proceedings. These bodies will be the means for giving direction and content to the growing demand for improvement in all departments of public life. The planning institutions will show the way to turn the growing protest against ugly cities, polluted air and water, an inadequate educational system, disappearing recreational and material resources, low levels of medical care, and the haphazard economic development into an integrated effort to raise the level of general welfare.

We are encouraged by the record of the planning institutions both of the Common Market and of several European nations and believe that this country can benefit from studying their weaknesses and strengths.

A principal result of planning will be to step up investment in the public sector. Greater investment in this area is advocated because it is overdue, because the needs in this sector comprise a substantial part of the content of the general welfare, and because they can be readily afforded by an abundant society. Given the knowledge that we are now in a period of transition it would be deceptive, in our opinion, to present such activities as likely to produce full employment. The efficiencies of cybernation should be as much sought in the public as in the private sector, and a chief focus of planning would be one means of bringing this about. A central assumption of planning institutions would be the central assumption of this statement, that the nation is moving into a society in which production of goods and services is not the only or perhaps the chief means of distributing income.

The Democratization of Change

The revolution in weaponry gives some dim promise that mankind may finally eliminate institutionalized force as the method of settling international conflict and find for it political and moral equivalents leading to a better world. The Negro revolution signals the ultimate admission of this group to the American community on equal social, political and economic terms. The cybernation revolution proffers an existence qualitatively richer in democratic as well as material values. A social order in which men make the decisions that shape their lives becomes more possible now than ever before; the unshackling of men from the bonds of unfulfilling labor frees them to become citizens, to make themselves and to make their own history.

But these enhanced promises by no means constitute a guarantee. Illuminating and making more possible the "democratic vistas" is one thing; reaching them is quite another, for a vision of democratic life is made real not by technological change but by men consciously moving toward that ideal and creating institutions that will realize and nourish the vision in living form.

Democracy, as we use the term, means a community of men and women who are able to understand, express and determine their lives as dignified human beings. Democracy can only be rooted in a political and economic order in which wealth is distributed by and for people, and used for the widest social benefit. With the emergence of the era of abundance we have the economic base for a true democracy of participation, in which men no longer need to feel themselves prisoners of social forces and decisions beyond their control or comprehension.

I. WHO ARE THE DISADVANTAGED?

The disadvantaged are known by many names for many reasons. They are not only minority citizens but represent all ethnic groups. They are often identified as our jobless, our poor, our under-educated, our young, our old. Basically, an individual is considered to be disadvantaged if he or she is a member of a poor family, unemployed, underemployed or not seeking work but should be. They will also possess one or more of the following characteristics:

a. School dropout

b. Special employment problems including being of a minority

c. Under 22 years of age

d. Over 44 years of age

e. Handicapped

It has been found after reviewing thousands of people who have passed through or who are enrolled in other programs, that many possess one or several of the above characteristics. A profile of the typical hard-core trainee is as follows:

Has been unemployed for eighteen months;

Never received intensive skill training;

Parents were unskilled;

Lives with one and one-half families;

Needs eye glasses, dental work;

Has seen a physician only once in his life;

Is married with three children;

Has no transportation;

Has a sixth-grade education;

Has had some contact with the law, and has spent at least 30 days in jails.

WHAT ARE THEIR NEEDS?

1. Physical

It has been found that they need a thorough physical examination. As mentioned above, they have seen a doctor only once in their lives. There is much evidence to indicate that for some, glasses will need to be prescribed and dental treatment required. No doubt for some, the examination will reveal the need for innoculations and corrective surgery before a person could go to work. Remedial medical and dental care may extend into the training period and consequently the employer must be prepared to allow time off for this essential need.

2. Attitudes and Feelings

The attitudes and feelings of some of the disadvantaged may pose a problem to an employer at the time of recruitment and the early training. For the most part these are conflicting attitudes or feelings rather than negative or positive ones. They have their origins in the trainees' personal history of failure to find opportunities for job, personal, and social satisfactions. The trainee may be somewhat cautious of taking you at your word, distrustful when you tell him about the opportunities obtainable for him by working for you, and lacking in confidence in his ability to satisfy you as an employer. However, we have found that these characteristics of the trainee change as he is given the kind of training he needs to succeed on the job. Step by step success in learning your job requirements will build the attitudes necessary for the trainee to retain the job.

3. Transportation

Except for those trainees who can conveniently walk to work, travel to the place of employment may present a problem. Until this problem is solved it will be a major (but not the only) cause for tardiness and absences from work. It is not a problem of the trainee alone because it involves his family too. Employers must be prepared, through counseling and other assistance if necessary, to assist the trainee in learning how to solve his personal and family transportation problem so that he can meet his work schedule.

4. Education

Additional or remedial education often must be provided for the unemployed. Almost all programs contain a job-related basic education or communicative skills program component in them, because most hard-core:

a. Have a tested third to sixth grade reading level;

b. Have a tested fourth-grade math level;

c. Because of (a), few can speak or write with clarity, organization, and meaning at more than a primary school level; and

d. Few can fill out employment forms, or follow written job instructions.

5. Job Skills

The work history of the unemployed usually shows temporary work at temporary jobs requiring little if any skill. Such jobs have not helped the person learn either technical skills or steady work habits. A few possess technical skills learned in military service but these are not always directly applicable to their local community's industrial needs. They all need technical training that is specific to the job for which they are hired. Industry has demonstrated its capacity to teach technical skills to employees, and the unemployed have demonstrated that when modern training technology is used in training programs they can and do learn necessary job skills.

6. Work Habits

Job training for the unemployed requires training in work habits. Employers cannot assume that habits of living as unemployed persons will disappear the moment unemployment ends and employment begins. Habits of punctuality, regular attendance, attention to safety requirements, care of tools and equipment, and other job related behaviors must be taught. Learning such required behaviors takes time, the same as learning technical skills takes time. Recent data from on-the-job training programs indicate that training in both work habits and in job skills is required for the disadvantaged population.

7. Personal Finances

In the absence of steady income at a living wage the personal finances of many unemployed persons are in disarray. A new job immediately presents a problem of money management on which the employee needs practical counseling. Creditors may press for wage garnishment while acute personal and family needs oftentimes will lead to unwise credit buying. It is to the interest of you as employer as well as to your trainee to provide counseling and other assistance lest these money crises drive the trainee from his job.

II. WORK POTENTIALS OF THE DISADVANTAGED PERSON

Evidence is accumulating rapidly from the private sector that when a real job, at a living wage, with equal opportunity for advancement, plus effective on-the-job training is offered members of this population, they can and do achieve as well as persons from other population groups. Their goals are the same as those of any other group; their potential capabilities for productive work too are the same.

The job expectations of the disadvantaged person, however, may be very limited because of previous failure to find the quality of employment which you will provide. Many have been involved in menial, short-term jobs; some have been involved in other publicity-sponsored programs which failed to equip them for, or to provide them with, a real job. This leaves them with much distrust, uncertainty and unwillingness to experience still another failure in the world of work. These limiting expectations do yield, fortunately, to feelings of confidence and trust when the job situation warrants such positive feelings.

The dress, speech, and personal appearance of the disadvantaged reflects the sub-cultures to which they belong. This is particularly true of those whose identifications are with the Black and the Mexican-American sub-cultures. It is apparent, too, that a very powerful motivation among these ethnic minorities is to find secure and meaningful places in the occupational systems of society. We have found that they will modify any personal behavior, speech, or dress to meet objective job requirements. Subjective requirements which they will interpret as rejection of their cultural values will be resisted. In this regard, too, the disadvantaged member of the ethnic minority is like any of us who take pride in our cultural values.

A major problem in training members of ethnic minorities is to establish mutually understandable person-with-person communications. Words and gestures mean different things in different cultures. It is necessary for everyone who interfaces directly with the trainee to understand his own and the trainee's communication behavior, both in speech and action. His own awareness of his speech and vocabulary limitations will cause him to be uncertain of himself. His cultural limitations, as they relate to this kind of situation, will cause him to be unsure of you. -

EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT
WASHINGTON, D.C. 20506

November 30, 1966

Mr. Moreland G. Smith, Sr.
3236 Bankhead Ave.
Montgomery, Ala.

Dear Mr. Smith,

We would like permission to include your name on our list of those interested in serving as consultants at VISTA conferences. Inclusion on the list will not obligate you in any way and if asked to serve at an inconvenient time you would be free to decline.

As you may already know, VISTA is one of the programs sponsored by the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity in its war against poverty. Volunteers in Service to America live and work with the poor in a wide variety of situations. (See the enclosed pamphlet.) During their year of service they attend several conferences designed to help them solve the problems encountered in their work with the poor. It is at these conferences that people like yourself are needed to provide the volunteers with expert advice.

The conferences are held on weekends at various places throughout the country and consultants are invited from as close by as possible to minimize the amount of travel required. Travel and all other expenses of the consultant are paid by VISTA. In addition, consultants receive an honorarium.

Would you please indicate on the enclosed form whether or not you would like to have your name placed on our list of available consultants? The form has space for certain other information which will enable VISTA to make the most intelligent use of you as a consultant. However, if you prefer, you may send us a resume instead.

If you have already served on a conference, please name the conference and give the date.

We hope that it will be possible for you to say "yes". Serving as a consultant at a VISTA conference is a way for you to make a solid contribution to our country's attack on the problems of the poor.

Sincerely,

Velma Linford

BRIEFING PAPER

VITA-USA DIVISION PLAN, 1970

A. Results of First Eleven and One-Half Months' Operation

1. General Conclusion

The program has been sufficiently successful to say that the major hypothesis of the demonstration has been proved:

> "that VITA's volunteer force, which has been utilized effectively in aiding developing countries, can be applied to help solve problems of poverty in the USA."

The VITA-USA program is unique in its ability to mobilize and apply volunteers for use in urban and rural poverty settings and on a national scale. The basic principles that have led to acceptance by community people needing help are:

- being responsive; we assist those who request help and in the way they desire

- performing well; capable staff is essential to handle volunteer selection, logistics of volunteer assignments, follow-up, etc.

Chapter Projects are needed to assist programs in metropolitan areas where manpower resources covering a broad skill spectrum can be mobilized.

The National Consulting Service is needed mostly by small cities and rural areas.

2. Quantity of Effort

During the 11½ months since the VITA-USA program was launched, 505 requests were received by the program. Responding to them, over 500 volunteers contributed 11,500 hours.

The program start-up was smooth, with top-notch staff being recruited within target dates. (Interestingly, six of the staff are ex-Peace Corps volunteers.) Methods and procedures have been developed, and an on-going evaluation permits continual improvement of these procedures.

Voluntary technical assistance is extremely economical since the consulting time is free.

3. Quality of Effort

Evaluation of the Boston Project and the National Consulting Service include the following conclusions on operating procedures:

- The requesters give VITA-USA high marks on volunteer selection and speed of response.

- VITA-USA cases involve mostly "soft technology" and are much more complex than previous international requests. They require more in-depth, on-site help and follow-up.

- Volunteers want feedback on results of their projects.

- For National Consulting Service: in 25 of 43 cases sampled VITA provided valuable input. VITA was of no help in two cases. The results of other cases are pending or not known.

- People do not clearly understand VITA-USA services from the literature. Communication about VITA's services must be improved.

Unique Characteristics

Evaluation interviews with requesters and volunteers point out some very special qualities of volunteer consulting:

a. Flexibility and Concern. Frequent personal involvement is possible. Other sources of help cannot do this easily because of "red tape".

b. Bridge to other private or governmental resources.

c. Availability. For the first time in many communities VITA represents a source of free technical assistance. Too often in the past community projects needing such assistance have gone without and failed.

d. Objectivity. Volunteers serve as objective outsiders; advice can be used publicly or privately to help the requester achieve his goals.

Examples illustrating these points:

- An objective study by Mr. and Mrs. Carl Swanson, Omaha volunteers, is being used by the Urban League there to secure a $160,000 housing grant. Swanson is a senior process engineer with the Allied Chemical Co., and Mrs. Swanson is a lawyer.

- A California Community Action Agency director reports valuable assistance in changing organization structure and personnel methods as a result of management analysis by VITA Volunteer, Dr. Carl Berger, who owns Electrolyte Technologies, Inc., Santa Ana, California. This case is still active after five visits and as many reports by the volunteer.

- Reflecting on VITA's assistance, a CAA director in West Virginia commented:

  "I had contacted OEO in Washington and was told that the chances of getting a consulting firm were very dim. I contacted VITA but did not expect any results....VITA provided the assistance asked for and more....provided a stimulus to the project when many were discouraged and about to give up hope. Dr. Starkweather has shown the way. We have hired a health specialist and are preparing the proposal for funding." (VITA Volunteer David Starkweather is a professor of Hospital Administration at U. of California at Berkeley.)

- "We didn't realize volunteers could do such a tremendous job", was the comment made by the Black Economic Union of Cleveland. VITA, through a volunteer in California, made contact with the Association of Systems Management in Cleveland and secured a local volunteer to assist B.E.U. in instituting a records and reporting system for its contracted consulting service to CAAs in Region IV.

Areas of Greatest Contribution

VITA has identified five areas of special expertise where volunteer consultation has been particularly effective in stimulating successful projects. They are, with examples:

a. Management Methods and Systems

VITA Volunteer Dave Briscoe (Lear Siegler, Oklahoma City) applied his experience in management systems to the problem of designing a manpower management plan for a voluntary services program of Dallas' CAA. The assistance included advice on recruiting, assigning, motivating, training, and administering volunteer workers. Mrs. L. Griffin, the CAA's volunteer director, instituted the system and now has eight volunteer coordinators utilizing hundreds of volunteers.

The development of a community services referral center for a Minnesota Model Cities Program is being aided by volunteer James Vint (J. C. Penney, Milwaukee), who has been asked to establish a comprehensive records and recording system for the project.

b. How to Obtain Financial Support

YOU, an amalgamation of over 200 youth gangs, needed assistance in costing projects and writing proposals for business ventures and community projects. VITA Volunteer Don Roha, an employee of VITRO, advised YOU on negotiating and handling subcontracts and on structuring a management development and training program for YOU staff. He developed business forms, prepared a manual for writing proposals, and conducted staff seminars. VITA's impact on YOU is demonstrated by the fact that after coaching by Mr. Roha and others the group successfully negotiated three contracts, with a fourth expected to be approved soon.

VITA-Boston is running a series of workshops to assist community groups in securing funds through private and public sources and to give expertise in this area to additional VITA volunteers so that they can be prepared to assist requesters, not only in Boston, but also in other locations through the National Consulting Service. To date, five community projects have received 13 grants totaling $263,500, partly as a result of VITA's help.

c. Education of the Economically Disadvantaged

Leila Robbins, a Commonwealth Service Corps volunteer who works at the CAA neighborhood center in Dorchester, Mass., asked for help in setting up a summer tutorial program for children. The VITA-Boston staff member selected to coordinate this request was particularly qualified to help, having once been a director of a tutorial program. The Storefront Learning Center (SLC) in the local area, itself a former requester, was asked to assist, and Mrs. Robbins was able to attend the SLC training program. Four VITA volunteers then conducted a workshop for Mrs. Robbins' staff and recruited teaching candidates for the program.

Help in developing a community day care center in southern Vermont was provided by VITA Volunteer, Mrs. Mary Gray. Thanks to Mrs. Gray's extensive experience in the area and her detailed recommendation, community support and facilities for the center are now being developed. The requester labeled her service "fantastic" and stated it was hard to believe that anyone could have found a person with so much expertise.

d. Recreation and Playgrounds

Boston VITA volunteers, working in the Chapter's Design and Development group, were asked to develop a playground for the Highland Park Free School. Participating in the design effort were members of the Institute of Art and the requesting parents. The one day "build-in" by VITA volunteers, parents, and children resulted in construction of a variety of structures that are very popular with the children and that would have cost about $5500 if they had been built commercially. The prototypes developed are being used by VITA to learn lessons for future playground projects. Already the Boston group has used its experience to assist playground design requesters in Cambridge, Mass. and Washington, D.C.

e. Business Development, Particularly in Rural and Small Town Areas

"Jack of All Trades Service Corporation", a maintenance business formed by the Bennington-Rutland Opportunity Council, Inc., received twelve visits from volunteer Richard Bowen (Stanley Home Products, Schenectady, N. Y.) on systems of floor maintenance, equipment procurement, job bidding. "Mr. Bowen brought over a floor machine and worked day and night to train the men. He visited our customers and set up a program of cleaning for each. He also helped with calls on new customers, increasing business." Sales of $10,000 in six months have been realized; much of this flowed to those previously out of work.

A Kentucky requester, working with a crafts project, stated, "VITA provided the assistance needed to this small agency which had neither funds nor confidence to seek elsewhere. In areas where volunteers were not available, excellent referrals were made, quite unlike others I have dealt with." Special praise was given to two volunteers, Malcolm Benjamin, an expert in product design for the United Nations, and Jean Godsman, public relations assistant with Hugh Stubbins and Associates (architects) in Boston. As a result of VITA's help in costing and market sources, a grant providing initial capital has been obtained and a market established in Washington, DC. Sixty people are involved.

4. VITA-USA has developed a model for establishing a nationwide network of effective urban chapter programs. Whereas one chapter program was the goal for the first year, two staffed projects have been started. The Boston Project is already up to over 500 volunteer man hours per month being devoted to projects with high success potential. The District of Columbia Project, though only four months old, has reached 250 volunteer hours, matching so far the growth experience in Boston.

B. Program Objectives for 1970

1. Scale up the demonstration program.

Targets: 32,000 volunteer man hours
Volunteers involved: 2500
Requesters directly affected: 25,000+

2. Increase impact of volunteer effort through specialization and in-depth involvement in high priority cases. At least ten priority centers of expertise will be developed by the end of 1970.

3. Focus on problems of larger urban areas through VITA chapter programs.

Targets:

a. Select and initiate staffed projects in five new locations. Selection of sites will be based on need, competing resources, availability of leadership and volunteers, opportunity to get information on new variables, such as the ethnic groups served, size of metropolitan area, representation of several parts of country.

b. Expand Boston Project to a steady state operation, handling at least 650 volunteer man hours/month. At least 40 cases will have 4 or more consultants (a rough index of significance of VITA's involvement). Workshops will be held and packets of useful materials developed for at least 2 specialty areas.

c. Expand DC-Are Project to at least 500 volunteer hour/month level. Uncover at least 5 major program opportunities for national program as a result of DC location.

d. Begin the move to privately finance chapter programs; chapter income target: $30,000.

4. Focus on problems of small cities and rural areas through the National Consulting Service. Experiment with a Rural Field Specialist to provide the kind of on-the-spot assistance in problem definition, volunteer support, and recruitment that has made chapter programs so successful.

5. Communicate more effectively to: recruit volunteers in needed specialties, tell potential requesters what VITA can do, foster interchange of information on problems and their solution.

6. Mount continuing research and evaluation efforts to learn about the technical assistance and voluntary action processes. Data from these studies will make it possible to determine best areas for future VITA emphasis and will be a major input to VITA's continuing long range planning activity.

7. Establish contact with key personnel in at least 25 major corporations to enlarge VITA's capability for getting volunteers on leave with pay for short term assignments.

Dear Mr. Rodgers:

I enjoyed talking with you last week. I have been thinking about our discussion. I was indeed surprised at your insight and concern for the poor. I am not trying to flatter you, by no means, but facts are facts, Black or White. There are few white skinned persons who impress me. I do not make it a habit to support their ideas and concepts. I am learning that racism is a two-way street. It prevents us from relating as men. It is a shame that adjectives like Black and White mean so much, divide so much and destroy so many. To be Black in my opinion is simply to be man. Let me put it this way:

To be white is to be guilty
To be Black is to be defensive
But to be man is a burden
It is much heavier than I
It simply requires a self
A man.

To be poor is explosive. It is a shame that poverty in this country is based on what you do not have rather than who you are. Poverty is the lack of growth. You and I, could never be free until we free ourselves from our inner poverty. EOA could not do it, separatism will not do it. It will take men with guts to free this ding-ling nightmare. In other words, I have to be Black in order to be Man.

Thank you very much and I hope our relationship will not stop here.

Yours truly,

John Stanley Alexander

WHAT IS IT?

An organization of volunteers and agency employees working to lessen the social problems of the Atlanta area

WHAT DOES IT DO?

Coordinates

Works with public and private groups in the fields of health, education and welfare to:

- Eliminate overlapping and duplicating services
- Create new services to provide for unmet needs
- Improve existing services

Plans

Evaluates needs and implements services to meet them

Does Research

Conducts studies of social problems and searches for resources to correct them

WHOM DOES IT SERVE?

People in the five-county metropolitan area

WHO FINANCES IT?

The United Appeal, local foundations and governmental units

THE PERMANENT CONFERENCE

The Permanent Conference is composed of the professional director and chief officer of the governing board of the participating agencies. There are about 400 members. An 18-man Executive Committee, chaired by Eugene Branch meets every other month to hear reports from staff and committees studying various social problems and the Executive Committee then makes decisions on what action should be taken.

The Permanent Conference has a small, but competent staff who have a broad knowledge of social welfare problems and about services which deal with these problems.

Some examples of the activities of the staff and committee are:

. A Treatment Plan for the Chronic Alcoholic Court Offender has been developed which is being used as a guide to institute services for the chronic alcoholic. The Metropolitan Crime Commission and the Community Council have formed a committee to implement this plan.

. Background for Decision Making - This document defines the problems of people and describes services which are available in the Atlanta Metropolitan Area to combat these problems. (See the attached flyer for full description.)

. Aging - Two proposals have been submitted to Washington for grants under the Older Americans Act. They are:

. A proposal to demonstrate the use of older people to supplement regular staff in a Children's Day Care Center, serving low income areas.

. A proposal to operate a day center giving personal care to old people.

. Volunteer Task Force - During the past year 250 volunteers were trained under a demonstration grant from OEO. Each volunteer received 30 hours of instructions including 15 hours of on-the-job supervision. They are presently working in agencies serving poverty areas.

. Information and Referral Service - This service is operated under the Permanent Conference. It maintains up-to-date information on services offered by agencies. It handles inquiries from persons needing help and makes referrals to the agency best fitted to serve them. (See brochure enclosed.)

. A Directory of Community Services has been published by the Permanent Conference. (See order blank enclosed.)

. Fund Appeals Review Board - On agreement with this Board, the Permanent Conference conducts studies of any new agency applying to the FARB for permission to conduct a campaign. During the past year the Permanent Conference studied the Planned Parenthood Federation, the Stacy Smith Home for Birth Defect Children and United Cerebral Palsy of Greater Atlanta, Inc.

. Day Care - A Committee has been active in recent months and will continue to work in planning with churches, Dept. of Family and Children Services, Chest agencies, and other groups to expand day care services for children.

. Family and Children's Seminars - A series of meetings has been held with agencies serving families and children. Discussion has centered around the role of the voluntary agency in the light of developments in the public field.

. Model Neighborhood Project - It is expected that the Permanent Conference will be involved in the social welfare component of this project (on contract with the City). Two social welfare planners will be employed.

. Consultation and Technical Assistance - During the past year the Permanent Conference staff has given consultation service to over 30 different agencies in program planning, and to funding bodies such as United Appeal, local foundations and others.

COMMUNITY COUNCIL OF THE ATLANTA AREA, INC.

The Research Center is organized and staffed to conduct studies of community problems and evaluations of agencies and services. On the basis of such studies in various fields, the Research Center develops long-range and comprehensive plans for improving services.

In order to be continually aware of emerging problems and changes in the welfare of Atlanta's citizens, extensive statistical and field work files are maintained. These files provide up-to-date information on the City of Atlanta and the surrounding counties as well as on the many neighborhoods in Atlanta. Through the field work efforts of our neighborhood analyst, we try to maintain contact with neighborhood civic organizations and other citizen groups. In this way, statistical data is balanced with qualitative information.

Research information from studies and our files are available to and widely used by local governments, social agencies, the Community Chest, foundations, citizen groups, churches, and other interested individuals.

The planning efforts of the Research Center are usually done with those agencies, funding bodies, and clients that will be affected by the plans. In this way, we are able to ensure much greater implementation of plans than would otherwise be possible.

Recent work by the Research Center has included studies of Atlanta's slums, comprehensive inventories and analyses of health, welfare, manpower, recreation, school services, and a metropolitan-wide study of recreation programs. Many other special studies and analyses were conducted on the request of specific agencies. In the area of planning, we completed, early last summer, the social plan related to urban renewal for Atlanta's Community Improvement Program. We are currently working on a detailed plan for the development of Atlanta's parks and recreation.

~~The summary chapters of two recent studies are included to illustrate further the kinds of work done by the Research Center.~~

HOSPITAL AND HEALTH PLANNING DEPARTMENT

I. Functions

A. To assist hospitals and health service organizations in the five counties with identification of health problems.

B. To assist in determining community health needs.

C. To cooperate with hospitals and health service organizations in developing plans to solve community problems.

D. To stimulate action in solving these health problems.

E. To review and evaluate programs and projects, and make recommendations to appropriate authorities.

II. Activities Completed or Presently in Progress

A. Future Hospital Plans: A Preliminary Report, was published in March 1966 which contained the long-range plans prepared by twenty-two hospitals in the Atlanta area.

B. A Patient Origin Study which included twenty-seven hospitals in the Atlanta area was published in March 1966.

C. In March 1967, a survey of 44 nursing homes in the Atlanta area was published which showed the conditions, services, plans and type of care offered by these homes.

D. A Private Duty Nursing Registry Committee was established in September 1966 for the purpose of endeavoring to improve the utilization of the private duty nurses in Atlanta.

E. Representatives of the Hospital and Health Planning Department appeared before the Commissioners of Fulton County to point out the need for a new general hospital in the Northside area of Fulton County. A Resolution establishing the Hospital Authority of Fulton County was approved by the County Commissioners on May 4, 1966.

F. In March 1967, the Hospital and Health Planning Department took an active part in helping the Fulton County Medical Society prepare a draft for a proposed comprehensive community health service in a selected poverty area of Atlanta.

G. A long-term hospital and health plan was prepared for the DeKalb County area. This was a total health program for DeKalb County which was developed by the Hospital and Health Planning Department in conjunction with the Hospital Authority of DeKalb County.

H. A long-term hospital and health plan for the five-county metropolitan area has been prepared.

I. A recruitment program for hospital and health personnel is in the process of development.

J. Coordinating meetings are held regularly with various organizations such as:

1. Joint Council on Paramedical Education in Georgia
2. Hospital Administrators Council of Atlanta Area
3. Hill-Burton Office of State Health Department
4. Executive Director, Georgia Hospital Association

K. Related activities of staff:

1. Responsible for metropolitan area Heart, Cancer, Stroke Program
2. Development of a Home Health Care Program
3. Developing a Nursing Home Care Improvement Project

IS JOB CORPS FOR YOU ?

WHAT IS JOB CORPS?

Job Corps is a program for young men and women who want a good job but do not have the training or education to get it. In the Job Corps you can learn to speak, read and write better. You will develop the skills and work habits you need to get and keep a job with good pay.

WHO CAN JOIN?

To join you must be at least 16 but not yet 22 years old. Job Corps is for you if you have dropped out of school and cannot find a good job. You may be eligible even if you are a high school graduate. Maybe you dropped out of school to help support your family or for some other reason. If your family does not have enough money to help train you for a job, Job Corps can help. Other young people who wanted to get ahead have found that Job Corps has helped them.

WHERE WILL I GO?

If you join Job Corps, you will move to a Job Corps Center away from home. It may be in a national park or forest, or it may be in or near a city. The Job Corps will pay for your transportation to the Center.

WHAT WILL I GET AT THE CENTER?

At the Job Corps Center you will get food, medical and dental care, some new clothes and spending money. If you have a wife or child to support, the Job Corps will help you send money home. There will be free time for fun with new friends, for sports, for TV and movies.

WHAT WILL I LEARN?

You will learn a skill and train for a job. You will have a chance to find out what is expected of you on the job and which job you do best. Clerical work, food service, hospital work, forestry work, auto mechanics are among the many skills taught at the Centers. The Centers will provide the books and materials you need.

WHAT DO I HAVE TO DO?

The Job Corps will expect you to give the program a fair chance and stay until you finish your training. Normally it takes at least six months to learn a skill. (However, you can stay as long as two years.) You will have to work hard at your training, attend classes, and follow Job Corps rules.

HOW DO I JOIN?

Call or visit your nearest State Employment Service, Women in Community Service, or Community Action Agency.

Or write: Job Corps
Washington, D. C. 20506

IS THERE A JOB IN MY FUTURE?

Job Corps will help you find a job after you finish your training. By then you will be prepared to earn a decent living. You will look forward to a brighter future.

JCRS-3

GPO : 1968 O - 321-346

QUESTIONS PARENTS ASK ABOUT THE JOB CORPS

WHAT IS JOB CORPS?

Job Corps is for young people who have not finished high school and cannot find good jobs. They come from all over the United States. They are of all races and religions. They are between 16 and 22 years old. They are all from low-income families.

Your son may spend as long as two years in Job Corps but can complete his training in less than one year. He will receive specialized training in such fields as automotive mechanics, salesmanship, and computer operations. Capable teachers will prepare him to find and hold a good job. Job Corps trains its graduates to be citizens of whom the country is proud and husbands and fathers whose wives and children will love and respect them.

WILL MY SON BE TAKEN CARE OF?

Job Corps will take excellent care of your son. Doctors and dentists will look after him. He will be supervised by a trained staff. His living-quarters will be comfortable. He will have his own bed and locker in a dormitory shared with other young men. He can eat as much as he wants. He will receive every-day clothing upon arrival at the Center. If your son shows he is serious about completing the program, he will receive money to buy dress clothing. He will be free to play sports, watch TV, go to the movies, and dances. He may attend the religious services of his choice.

WHAT WILL MY SON HAVE TO DO?

Your son will have to obey the rules and regulations. He will have classes every day. He will have to go to bed and get up at a regular time. He will have to make his bed and help keep his living-quarters clean. He will have to ask permission to leave the Center. If your son wants this opportunity, he will obey the rules. If he does not, Job Corps may have to send him home.

HOW MUCH WILL MY SON EARN?

Your son will receive a living allowance of $30 a month, and may earn raises up to $20 a month more. When he leaves, he may also receive money for each month he was in Job Corps if he completes his training or stays long enough to qualify. Social Security and Federal Income tax will be deducted from his pay and allowances. You should ask the screener whether your son is eligible to send an allotment home.

HOW OFTEN CAN I SEE MY SON?

You can visit your son any time. He will be sent to a Center as close to home as possible. The screener will tell you all about the Center chosen for him. After six months of satisfactory performance, he will be eligible for a visit home at the Government's expenses. In case of an emergency, arrangements can be made for a special visit.

WHAT CAN I DO TO HELP?

You can help your son by telling him how proud you are that he is in Job Corps. He needs your encouragement. He may be homesick. This is normal. Once your son has made new friends, he will find it easier. Write to him often. If you can, telephone him occasionally.

Your son can join Job Corps only with your consent. You should be happy to back him up all the way. Your signature on the parental consent form means that you want your son to enter Job Corps, that you know of nothing that would make him ineligible for Job Corps, that you agree to Job Corps providing him with routine medical and dental care and that you mean to give him all the help you can so that he will complete the program.

PERSONAL INTERVIEW

A. In the personal interview the applicant will be rated in five (5) categories. Questions should be directed to the applicant which will enable the interviewer to rate the applicant on sincerity of interest, attitude toward work, attitude toward related training, ability to work under supervision, understanding of responsibilities as Apprentice, ability to work with others and why he wants to become an apprentice in the printing trade, and his attitude toward unions.

B. The applicant should also be rated on his personal references.

C. The applicant should be rated on his physical appearance. (An applicant who does not bother to be neat when appearing before the screening committee usually has little interest in what the screening committee thinks and is not interested enough in the trade to succeed.)

D. In the event the applicant is already employed by the employer and is not permitted to take the aptitude test administered by the Georgia State Employment Service, the applicant will be given five (5) points for each year of employment in the printing industry up to a maximum of four (4) years or twenty (20) points.

SUBJECT: MANPOWER PROGRAMS

IN

ATLANTA, GEORGIA

ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY ATLANTA (EOA)

PURPOSE: To provide employment and placement for low income individuals within the five target areas of Atlanta and surrounding cities.

SERVICE: A Georgia State Employment Service representative is placed in the EOA Neighborhood Service Centers to counsel and test individuals for employment. There is a manpower director in each service center to help with placement. Atlanta, Georgia 30310
Robert A. Ferguson, Director

PURPOSE: The purpose of the Atlanta Area Technical School is to prepare students for useful and gainful employment in occupations that do not normally require a four-year college degree. These occupational areas include the engineering technician, skilled business, office and health occupations. The total curriculum offered at the school was established on the basis of training needs of business and industry in the metropolitan Atlanta area, plus indicated student interest in the area of instruction.

Objectives:

1. To increase the individuals potential through planned instructional activities by using all the modern techniques of teaching that produce the best motivation for learning.

2. To equip every individual with the productive capacity to attain his economic, social and intellectual goals in our society.

In - Plant Training:

1. Atlanta Area Tech's Department of Industrial and Business Service enhances the pre-employment training of the school by assisting local industry and business with their continual problems of upgrading the skills and knowledge of their personnel.

2. The school Industrial Training Coordinators consult with the company in an effort to help them identify their training needs and develops appropriate courses. The coordinators also secure qualified instructors and administer the class to assure quality results.

3. Any organization private or public that has as many as fifteen employees who need training in a particular area can get assistance from our coordinators.

4. There is no cost to companies for the service of the coordinators or the instructors. A modest registration fee is charged for the student's instructional supplies and incidentals.

Learning, Earning and Educational Program:

1. This program is designed to provide those students who want to prepare for a job but don't qualify for any of the school's regular programs because:

   a. They do not meet the basic education requirements, for their vocational choice.

   b. They are uncertain as to what vocational endeavor would be best for them.

   c. They cannot or do not want to spend over one quarter in preparing for a job.

REPORT

THE VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT, INC.

EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE MEETING

MOTON MEMORIAL FOUNDATION

CAPAHOSIC, VIRGINIA

July 24-26, 1970

FOREWORD

This Capahosic Retreat, the first for the "New VEP," was held at Holly Knoll amidst the relaxed atmosphere along the York River.

Our Executive Committee, our past and present supporters and friends, and the staff came together to talk about what has been done in the area of voter education and registration in the past, how we can profit from and utilize this experience in the future, the problems we face, and what new heights we may set our sights on within the new structure of VEP.

The following pages reflect the "documented" facts of what happened at our meeting. However, the warmth, support, fellowship, and goodwill generated during those three days could not ever be conveyed properly on paper.

I wish to express our appreciation for the continued demonstrations of belief and faith in what we are doing. This trust and confidence is the origin of VEP, and it will be the strengthening factor of our future.

-- John Lewis
Executive Director
VEP, Inc.

CAPAHOSIC MEETING REPORT

The first retreat for the Executive Committee and staff of the new Voter Education Project, Inc., began Friday evening, July 24, 1970, at Holly Knoll, Capahosic, Virginia. John Lewis, Executive Director of VEP, presided over the opening session beginning with the keynote address by the Honorable Julian Bond, "Where We Are, and Where Do We Go From Here?"

Mr. Bond recalled Dr. Kenneth Clark's statement that elected officials provide black communities, for the first time, with democratically selected leadership. But he added:

> "Over and over again, black elected officials, black political hopefuls, and black political activists discover that the problem is more than getting registered and getting elected; it is having access to the knowledge, expertise, experience, funds, and associations that can make the difference between innocent, well-meaning incompetents in black-face, and viable, forceful, and effective representation for thousands of previously unrepresented people."

There is a need, Mr. Bond said, for regular and scholarly analysis of black voting patterns; how national legislation and metropolitanism would affect black political aspirations; how many new 18-year-old voters will be black; the backgrounds of black delegates and alternates to the 1968 political conventions; and what congressional elections will be influenced by the black vote in 1970 and 1972.

"The services available to black political activists need to be coordinated," Mr. Bond added. "The services available need to be more widely dispersed."

Mr. Bond also called for an independent and non-partisan "mechanism" to report on the successes, failures, problems, and errors of newly elected officials and to "call /them/ to account."

The questions and problems he had raised, Mr. Bond continued, could not be answered by agencies in New York and Washington that are too far removed from the southern struggle. Mr. Bond urged greater and stronger support for "the agencies and people in the South like the Voter Education Project who have demonstrated a continuing interest in the political fortunes of the black South, and who were willing to venture into it when it was more dangerous, physically and politically, than it is today."

David F. Rock, member of the Atlanta law firm of Haas, Holland, Freeman, Levison, and Gibert, then gave "An Analysis of How the Tax Reform Bill Affects VEP." Mr. Rock represented VEP in its successful effort to obtain tax-exempt status under the new law.

Mr. Rock described the Tax Reform Act of 1969 as an "overreaction by Congress to isolated abuses of the tax exemption privileges" and "a vehicle for angry elements in Congress who regarded their interests as somehow jeopardized by voter registration drives." He predicted that the Act might cause some small foundations to go out of business and turn over their funds to large foundations, thus concentrating philantropic wealth in fewer hands.

Mr. Rock described a "private foundation," as defined in the Act, and outlined the restrictions placed upon private foundations. Any propaganda or activity designed to influence legislation is subject to a penalty tax, he said. Non-partisan voter registration is permitted if (a) no more than 25 per cent of the funds comes from a single tax-exempt organization ; (b) the funds are not earmarked for use in a single state or single election; and (c) registration activities are not confined to a single election period and are carried on in five or more states.

In order to meet the latter requirements, Mr. Rock explained, a ruling has been obtained from the Internal Revenue Service that each group supported by VEP is an agent of VEP. So that organizations giving money to VEP will not be covered indirectly by the same restrictions applying to VEP, money given to VEP is for use within the general framework of VEP's operations and is not earmarked for voter registration.

Restrictions also are placed on grants to individuals, Mr. Rock noted. He interpreted these restrictions as meaning that VEP could not give a grant to an individual except under certain circumstances, so that the individual could undertake research of his own choosing. However, VEP could employ someone to conduct research, making sure that the research would benefit primarily VEP rather than the individual employed.

If VEP gives funds to another private foundation, VEP must accept "expenditure responsibility" and see that the funds are properly spent. Funds spent by private foundations must be for purposes which are religious, charitable, scientific, literary, or educational.

Mr. Rock then described the Act's restrictions on "self-dealing." Any grants or payments to government officials, except reasonable reimbursements for travel, constitute self-dealing. "Government official" covers a wide range of elected and appointed federal and state officials, including executive and personal assistants and secretaries.

Such find-raising activities as dinners, raffles, and entertainments are permitted, Mr. Rock said, so long as these activities are not undertaken so regularly as to become a business in itself. Such things as magazine selling advertising to the general business community, or a movie house opened for general entertainment would be subject to taxation. Tickets for fund-raisers would be tax deductible to the extent to which the ticket price exceeded the service (e.g., the value of the actual meal at a benefit dinner) rendered.

On Saturday morning, July 25, with the President of the VEP Board, Mr. Donald L. Hollowell, presiding, members of the staff reported, beginning with John Lewis. Mr. Lewis' report focused on the voter registration activities of VEP.

Although there has been a dramatic increase in black registration, one-third of the region's voting-age blacks are not registered, Mr. Lewis pointed out. He said that interest is running high this year because of a number of crucial elections and VEP, Inc., already had some 200 applications for grants on file when it was able to resume its registration activities in June.

Even with the Voting Rights Act, Mr. Lewis noted, there are some areas in the South, particularly rural areas, in which registration barriers remain. He cited the case of Stewart County, Georgia, one of the first projects funded in June by VEP, Inc., and introduced Mrs. Clara Thomas, a registration leader from that county who had graciously consented to attend the meeting. Mr. Lewis added:

> "It has become rather difficult for us to justify the funding of voter registration efforts in large urban centers such as Atlanta, Memphis, and New > Orleans, where more than 50 per cent of the blacks of voting age are registered, and there are few, if any, major hindrances to registration. We are committing funds for voter registration to those areas of the South where the need is more acute."

Much work remains to be done, Mr. Lewis declared, "in organizing the unorganized, registereing the unregistered, and providing a voice for the voiceless."

During Mr. Lewis' presentation, a new VEP register-to-vote tape was played, and the group voiced its general approval. The tape, made by Zebra Advertising Company in New York, is being sent to black radio stations in the South.

Dr. Charles Rooks, Director of Technical Assistance Programs, presented a paper which he summarized for the meeting, on VEP's service centers for black elected officials. After sketching briefly the positions and locations of some 600 black elected officials in the region, and mentioning the outlook for the election of more such officials in the next few years, Dr. Rooks listed the following ways in which service centers can assist black officials:

1. Orientation to office. This might be accomplished through preparing training manuals, conducting workshops, assigning a consultant or intern to render either short-term or long-term assistance, and arranging trips to consult with experienced officials;
2. Providing information on using an office in a positive manner. This might go beyond the training manual by providing information on government and private grants, assisting in grant applications, investigating new means of obtaining grants, passing along information about accomplishments of officials elsewhere, providing special consultants, and providing staff aides;

3. Protection against charges of malfeasance. If not otherwise provided, accountants could be furnished to audit books when blacks take office in order to forestall accusations of financial mismanagement;

4. "Crisis" assistance. Black officials should have somewhere to turn when unexpected situations arise, either through chance or through deliberate harassment.

Some of this assistance could be provided by the service centers, Dr. Rooks added, but new means would have to be found to provide other assistance. He listed possible additional resources:

1. A "clearinghouse" of information for black elected officials. This clearinghouse would supply information on government programs, what other officials are doing, new ideas and experiments, and the like. This would be done on both regional and state levels.

2. Training programs for present and potential leaders. This would include training regarding such things as community organization, registration drives, and political campaigns, to be done within the limitations on the use of tax-exempt funds.

3. Research into the experiences of places such as Fayette, Mississippi, Hancock County, Georgia, and Greene County, Alabama, where blacks take political control.

4. Use of graduate students, consultants and researchers to supply a wide range of assistance to school systems, including investigation into the use of Title I funds.

5. Use of graduate students in other fields -- law, political science, economics, business administration, and so on -- under an agreement, where possible, that would grant academic credit for work with a service center or directly with officials. A possible by-product would be a decision on the part of some of these students to do similar work after graduation.

The Director of Research, Marvin Wall, discussed research, publications, and future studies. Mr. Wall pointed out that research activities are necessarily limited by the amount of money available. Research activities, he added, are further limited by day-to-day responsibilities, including the following: Keeping progress reports on projects funded by VEP; answering inquiries from the Justice Department, Congress, the Civil Rights Commission, and others about Voting Rights complaints and in turn referring such complaints to the proper federal, state, and local authorities; answering requests for information from news agencies, USIA, political parties, civil rights organizations, authors, students, teachers, and others; keeping statistics, information, and publications up-to-date; working with state VEPs, service centers, and other researchers in editing and preparing publications and voter education material; acting as a "broker" in getting various public and private agencies in touch with grassroots leaders and others with key information, and vice versa; and assisting VEP projects in researching state election codes, dealing with local officials, and meeting other problems.

But if money and time permit, Mr. Wall proposed several research undertakings:

1. A study of fraud, gerrymandering, legerdemain, and other election security problems. Results of this research would become the basis of a how-to-prevent-it booklet and, perhaps, an audio-visual presentation such as a film or film-strip. Mr. Wall said this material would be important in helping black voters and candidates protect themselves from election fraud.

2. An intensive survey to determine the accuracy or inaccuracy of VEP's current registration estimates. This would be done by employing teams of students to make county-by-county checks to obtain the best possible official or unofficial figures on registration, by race. Mr. Wall pointed out that the 1970 Census' general population characteristics soon will be available, providing new figures on voting-age population, by county and by race. He also noted that statistics on voting-age population would have to be revised anyway when the new 18-year-old voting provision becomes effective. If registration figures are not available for every county, Mr. Wall explained, the survey would select enough key counties to provide a reliable statewide estimate.

Significant political breakthroughs can be expected in the future, Mr. Wall concluded. He said the predicted exodus of whites has not taken place in Fayette, Mississippi; Greene County, Alabama; Hancock County, Georgia; and Macon County, Alabama. Recalling Bayard Rustin's prediction made several years ago that Mississippi in 25 years would be among the most progressive states in the Union, Mr. Wall expressed the opinion that this dream is not dead.

Directors of VEP's three service centers -- Sherrill Marcus of Miles College, Thomas E. Smith of Southern University, and Antonio L. Thomas of Clark -- gave brief reports on the work of their centers.

Mr. Marcus said technical assistance currently being provided by his center includes: advice on federal-aid programs, legal advice, voter registration surveys, seminars for elected officials and consultants, community organization and neighborhood development. Mr. Marcus said a hoped-for expanded program would increase the center staff to give elected officials more assistance in community-action programs, to provide some officeholders with full-time interns, to provide more consultants, to print booklets, and to gather more reference material for the center office.

Mr. Smith reported that the Louisiana center is equipped to render technical assistance in five categories: research, legal, leadership training, consultive, and resource materials. Where a large number of blacks have been elected to parallel office, workshops have been held in which they are made aware of the center's services. Legal problems are common during an officeholder's first term. The University Law School usually is able to handle requests referred by the center. If not, the officeholder is referred to the Lawyers Constitutional Defense Committee, or some similar organization. Other divisions of the University, such as the College of Engineering and the College of Education, usually are willing to make their resources available at the request of the center.

The Louisiana center is organizing a Title I Task Force consisting of the center staff and representatives from the Law School and College of Education. This Task Force will visit localities to aid school board members, PTAs, and other community groups in evaluating existing Title I programs and recommending new ones.

Mr. Thomas reported on the difficulties he had encountered in involving students in the Georgia center's activities. On one occasion, he noted, student volunteers were enlisted to monitor meetings of public bodies, such as the school board and aldermanic board, in Atlanta. However, only a few of the volunteers actually participated.

Mr. Thomas mentioned efforts to communicate complaints from black communities to black officeholders. He added, however, that he was not sure how far VEP wanted him to go in this direction.

On one occasion the Georgia Center arranged for black community leaders to confront a gathering of officeholders, Mr. Thomas recalled, and this brought some criticism from VEP.

A discussion followed on utilizing students and faculty members to assist black officeholders. Board members said VEP must prepare for an increase in the number of black officials and anticipate their needs. There was a suggestion that students enrolled in Black Studies programs be recruited. It was stated that black students from the South would be preferred, but students of any race or region could be used. Students would have to understand their responsibility to the officeholder to whom assigned, and lay aside the desire to "do their own thing." One suggested means of assisting was that of preparing digests of proposed legislation and ordinances.

Enlisting the aid of the academic community was discussed at length. It was stressed that many students must work their way through college and cannot afford to work as unpaid volunteers. Hence either money or college credit must be offered. Ideas for approaching teachers of political science were discussed, and further discussion was reserved for the next meeting of the Executive Committee.

Consensus: VEP must clearly define the services the centers are to provide, and the centers must become as knowledgeable as possible about other resources available to meet the needs of the growing number of black elected officials.

The next discussion centered on whether VEP should limit registration activities to those counties having less than one-half of the blacks registered. While it was felt that efforts should be concentrated on these counties, it was also felt that factors in areas with registration above 50 per cent should not be disregarded. Among these factors: interest in the community; projections as to the future of the community; number of black people elected and community interest developing therefrom; and presence of working community groups.

Consensus: There should be no hard and fast rule. VEP should provide support in those areas in which there is a good potential for black participation in the political process, always recognizing that exceptions will arise.

Then came a discussion about whether VEP should take part in direct action. It was recalled that VEP had been indirectly involved in direct-action situations, notably in LeFlore County, Mississippi, in the first half of the decade.

Consensus: VEP should not assume the leadership in direct action. However, it is recognized that situations might arise in which VEP involvement would be appropriate. Most of the time VEP should maintain an advisory role. Involvement of a grantee or prospective grantee should not affect funding by VEP.

A panel discussion was held on, "Current Needs in the South -- What's Ahead and VEP's Role." Panel Members were: Donald L. Anderson, Harry Bowie, E. D. Nixon, Leslie Dunbar, Norman Hill, and Julian Bond. Presiding was Frank Smith, Vice President of the Executive Board. Views of the panel members were as follows:

Bowie: Next year will be a major election year in Mississippi. Most blacks previously elected in Mississippi hold relatively minor positions. VEP should pay particular attention to those areas in which 18-to-21-year-olds can be motivated to register. Moreover, certain counties are being reapportioned and total re-registration is being required in these counties. These counties should get special consideration.

Nixon: In Alabama, VEP should be identified with groups throughout the state. VEP needs to be sure all funds will be spent where they can be utilized. VEP needs to fund additional programs for maximum results.

Dunbar: VEP has got to have a sense of strategy as to what makes a difference in people's lives. There are a number of things needing to be done and there are a lot of expectations on any scale, but of all the necessary things for the South is to increase political participation by minority people. That is number one.

Hill: The A. Philip Randolph Institute has encouraged voter registration work by black trade unionists in major cities across the country. VEP should know which cities are included and make efforts to work with these black trade unionists.

Bond: More technical assistance should be available to black activists. Service centers should be an avenue of help for existing groups. Growth trends in business, industry, government, etc., should be examined to spot future employment opportunities, e.g., growth of hospitals means more jobs for nurses and hospital service employees.

Officeholders should not be allowed to serve without challenge. Their actions should be scrutinized and they should be held accountable to their constituents. There is a need to find out why some people who should run for office do not.

Anderson: Poor blacks in Southside Virginia are striving to solve their problems through Assemblies -- a sort of community organization succeeding where so many OEO Community Action Programs are failing. Each Assembly is a 50-member committee. In turn, there are higher committees consisting of representatives from the lower committees. Structure is along lines of British Parliament. Problems not solved at the Assembly level moves up to the higher committee level. The hope is to eventually move past multi-county level to statewide level. Assemblies are working on such basic needs as food and clothing, medical and recreational facilities, farm and consumer cooperatives, legal aid, family planning, education, employment, minority business enterprise, etc. Assemblies could spearhead registration drives.

Board member Henry Marsh said that VEP seems to be concentrating on Deep South states. He urged more emphasis on border states. Different strategies, he noted, may be necessary in rural and urban areas.

Mr. Bowie proposed a study of population migration in order to project, say 10 years ahead, where the black registration potential will be dropping. He suggested that groups already aided by VEP assist in locating groups to work in areas where no aid has been given. There are some areas, he added, which have not been assisted. It is especially important, he continued, that VEP give aid in those counties where re-registration is required.

The main problem in Alabama, said Mr. Nixon, is getting people to use the ballot. People have to be taught the power of the ballot, he added. Some blacks have fears about how they will be treated at the polls.

Chairman Hollowell asked if anyone could relate instances of devious actions to thwart black political participation. Mrs. Thomas cited the difficulties encountered in Stewart County, Georgia, the main one being arbitrary closings of the registration office when blacks were seeking to register. Mr. Nixon observed that the registration system works against the working man -- that is, the registration office opens after the working man goes to work and closes before he gets off.

Mr. Hollowell asked whether VEP could pay attorney's fees in legal actions arising out of registration projects. Mr. Rock felt that this probably could be done, so long as the legal action came about as part of the registration process. Moreover, Mr. Rock added, VEP is an educational organization. Enlightenment of the public about registration difficulties dramatized through legal action hence would be within VEP's tax-exempt status.

Consensus: Where projects encounter registration difficulties, each instance should be carefully and thoroughly documented. It is important to see that each violation is properly and officially reported to the appropriate local, state, or federal authority, whether or not that authority could be expected to take action. In this way, redress could be sought at the proper level, with the complaint and action documented.

Sunday morning, July 26, Chairman Hollowell gave a recapitulation of the three-day gathering, emphasizing the points of unamimity of the group.

It was generally agreed that although it is apparent that voter registration needs the continued support of VEP and its friends, concentrated activity in the area of voter education seems especially urgent. Many suggestions for research and technical assistance projects were directed to the hundreds of newly elected black officials.

Through the interest and support of many old friends, VEP has been able to make a substantial contribution toward the enfranchisement of southern blacks. But this is only a first step toward full political participation. It now falls to VEP and its friends -- both old and new -- to ensure that the vote becomes an effective instrument to improve community life.

The meeting was adjourned at 10:30 a. m.

Are Selective Affairs

VEP * * *

Both Parties Seek to Sign Up Supporters, Bypass Foes; 'Cherrypicking' at Churches

#2 9/18/70

By P. F. KLUGE
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

LOS ANGELES — Everybody's in favor of voter registration. It's "like apple pie and motherhood," says a California Republican politician.

"But," he quickly adds, "you've got to be selective. You've got to make sure you register the right mothers."

As practiced in California, voter registration is a discriminating but imperfect art, with each party seeking to sign as many of its followers as possible while enrolling as few of the opposition faithful as it can.

Political organizations everywhere try to use voter registration to further their own causes, of course. But such efforts take on special significance in states like California that purge nonvoters from electoral lists after every general election. In California, whose population is nearly 20 million, parties must struggle just to maintain past numerical strengths. For the Democrats, that task hasn't been easy. Since Ronald Reagan won a landslide victory over Gov. Edmund G. Brown four years ago, Democratic registration has slipped to 4.4 million from 4.5 million. In the same period Republican registration has risen to 3.3 million from 3.1 million.

Those figures might still appear to give the Democrats a comfortable edge. "But the GOP has greater party loyalty," says Elizabeth Gatov of the Democratic State Central Committee. "About 25% of the Democrats vote Republican, and we're lucky to pick up 11% of the Republican vote. This year we think the difference between our statewide candidates' winning and losing rests with voter registration."

A Crucial Test for Unruh

For Jesse M. Unruh, the Democratic state chieftain, registration is crucial. Mr. Unruh, who faces the tough job of trying to take the governorship from Mr. Reagan in November, has said: "There's no doubt that if all of California's unregistered voters would register and vote, I would win."

That's why Mr. Unruh's workers undertook this summer one of the most ambitious registration campaigns in the state's history. Four million voters were unregistered, and Mr. Unruh declared that "three of the four million would be mine" if they could be signed up. He set his goal at one million registrants—a figure he has said "would produce a damned near automatic victory." The Republicans set a relatively modest goal of 187,000.

The two parties will have to wait a while to determine the results of the drives. Although the registration deadline passed last week, the totals won't be in for some time.

Both parties acknowledge that the first law of voter registration is "dealing to strength"—hitting hard at those areas that traditionally contain many members of your party and few of the opposition. "We figure birds of a feather flock together," says Vincent J. Barabba, chairman of Decision Making Information, an affiliate of the GOP-oriented Spencer Roberts campaign management firm.

Registration Can Be Simple

Thus, registration is a relatively simple matter in Democratic bastions like east and south-central Los Angeles or GOP-dominated areas like Newport Beach. Both parties can "shotgun," or "cherrypick"—that is, send out deputy registrars to enroll new voters without fear of picking up an inordinately high number of the opposition.

"The Democrats could set up a card table on a street corner in Los Angeles, and three out of five new voters would go their way," says George Kelly, director of precinct operations for the California Republican Party. "They could set up a table outside an unemployment office and they'd get eight out of 10."

That's what the Democrats did—and more. In predominantly Negro south-central Los Angeles, Democrats stood outside banks on Fridays, which are paydays, and outside churches on Sundays. They haunted car washes. "They're good places because people are just standing around waiting for the job to get done," a Democratic official says.

But registration becomes a far more sophisticated task in the marginal districts—uncertain areas where neighborhoods have changed or party loyalties are fickle and precinct organizations are weak. It's here that California law helps the parties register the right people by permitting them to send out so-called bird dogs with their deputy registrars.

The deputies solicit new registrations and fill out necessary affidavits but are obliged to accommodate any new voter, regardless of party preference. So, to prevent registration of a large number of opposition voters, distinctly partisan bird dogs accompany the supposedly neutral deputies. The advance men—called walkers, Indians or beaters as well as bird dogs—must have what one Democrat calls "the ability to pleasantly probe." They ferret out unregistered supporters of the parties and steer their deputies to them—and away from the opposition.

Veteran registration teams learn their territories. While Democrats feel free to shotgun at auto plants, for example, they consider it mandatory to send bird dogs to aerospace facilities, where workers are less certain to be loyal Democrats. "You can't get into trouble as long as you use a bird dog," observes one Democratic worker.

But some deputy registrars of both parties claim they can spot a "friendly" from 50 yards. "You can walk through a Democratic neighborhood and tell which is a Republican home," asserts Mrs. Shirley Fraser, a GOP deputy in suburban Ventura County. "It's the one that isn't beat up—the one where the screen door isn't torn, where the lawn is mowed."

Mrs. Arlene Quilici, another GOP deputy in Ventura County, looks for the eagles. "There was this place with a little eagle knocker on the door and another eagle over the nameplate," she recalls. "I knew it was a Republican house even before I knocked on the door. Democrats don't put eagles out."

Other deputies develop techniques that would dazzle an encyclopedia salesman. Says one Democratic deputy: "Sometimes when they don't feel like registering, I ask them whether they don't believe it's their duty as a citizen to voice their opinion. If that doesn't work, I ask them—and this is illegal—if they really want Reagan to stay in another four years. And sometimes I mention I get 25 cents for every new registration. I ask them to register as a favor to me."

Deputies generally get such nominal payments from the county—a quarter, for example, for each new registration in Los Angeles County. But that's only a fraction of the price of party voter registration efforts, whose soaring costs worry politicians in both camps.

The average cost now is $1 a head for registration "and it's up to $2 in some contested areas," says Marvin Brody, an official of the United Auto Workers union here. Many political observers say even that figure is low. They note that extensive and competitive registration campaigns prompt additional—and illegal—payments to registrars by their parties and wages of up to $2.50 an hour for bird dogs. "We understand some of the parties have been paying extra, and we've told them not to do it," Los Angeles County Registrar-Recorder Ray Lee says wearily.

It's unlikely, however, that the scent of money is what makes most bird dogs and deputy registrars run. Voter registration is mind-numbing, exhausting work conducted in the heat of the summer, well before interest in campaigns has crested and too soon to win credit for eventual victory or blame for defeat.

One Democratic aide calls registration "the blocking and tackling of politics." Whipping up enthusiasm for a registration effort is almost impossible, says a ranking GOP strategist in California. "It's like saying, 'Let's shovel manure. It's fun and it will clean out the barn.' It's one of the most uninteresting and unromantic jobs that a volunteer is likely to do," he observes.

ANNUAL REPORT

OF THE

VOTER EDUCATION PROJECT, INC.

1970

5 Forsyth Street, N. W.
Atlanta, Georgia 30303

Personal Note From the Executive Director

I have had the opportunity since March to serve the Voter Education Project as Executive Director, succeeding Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., who assumed the post of Executive Director of the United Negro College Fund.

Vernon had been the Director since 1965. His work in the South laid a firm base for VEP and has assisted immeasurably in the smooth transition of this office.

I want to thank the Executive Director, Paul Anthony, the Executive Committee, and Staff of the Southern Regional Council, and our own VEP Board and Staff for the assistance they have rendered to me.

Nineteen-seventy marks the beginning of a new decade, a decade in which the Voter Education Project clearly has a significant role to play. We must continue to support the maximum participation of minority people in the political process. We must reach out and assist in the vital areas of voter education and citizenship education.

Our work is cut out for us. Because of the problems or reorganization, we only had about six months in 1970 to really do our job. In 1971, we must double our efforts to stimulate and educate and at the same time eradicate the remaining vestiges of discrimination which have so harmfully divided this society in the past.

It is my sincere belief that we can make the South the model for the nation -- black and white, rich and poor -- and that the day will come in the continued struggle when we will have overcome.

John Lewis

INTRODUCTION

The twelve months covered by this report were perhaps the most crucial in the history of VEP. The year began with the very existence of VEP in serious question. For several months after it appeared that VEP might survive, there was still uncertainty over whether sufficient funds would be available for an effective program. But as the year drew to a close, VEP had overcome all these obstacles and was moving into a larger scope of operations than ever before.

In December, 1969, Congress passed a new tax reform law, much of which was concerned with regulating the use of tax-exempt foundation funds. Several new restrictions on the use of such funds for voter registration activities were written into the law. Since one of VEP's primary purposes is to support voter registration activities and almost all of its funds come from foundations, this new law directly affected the existence of VEP. Eventually, as the law was interpreted, it became clear that VEP would have little difficulty in complying with most of these provisions, but one new requirement appeared to raise a very serious problem. Under the new law, an organization engaged in voter registration activities cannot receive more than twenty-five per cent of its funds from one source. The Southern Regional Council, Inc., of which the Voter Education Project was a part, received considerably more than one-fourth of its support from one foundation. After considering various alternatives, it was decided that the best solution to this dilemma was to separate VEP from SRC. This meant that only VEP would be subjected to the 25 per cent clause of the new law.

It took until June 1 to complete the process of legally separating the two organizations and gaining a tax-exemption for the newly incorporated VEP. During this period, many of VEP's activities were curtailed, or fully suspended in the case of voter registration.

Although it required several weeks after incorporation to remove all the difficulties involved in receiving funds from foundations, VEP was deeply gratified by the response of its friends in the foundation world. Not only did those foundations which were supporting VEP when the new was enacted continue to contribute, but some of the foundations which had supported VEP in its earlier days also came back to assist VEP as it faced the new conditions imposed by the law.

This does not mean that VEP faces no financial problems in the future. Because there cannot be a dependence on any one or two large foundations to provide the bulk of its funds, VEP must broaden its base of support. During the last few months of 1970, efforts were begun not only to seek new foundation contributors, but also to develop a program which would raise money from other groups and individuals.

In addition to organizational changes, there were also important personnel changes at VEP during 1970. Mr. Vernon Jordan, who had directed VEP since December, 1965, resigned in February to become Executive Director of the United Negro College Fund. His secretary, Mrs. Nobbie Morgan, moved to the Southern Regional Council to become Administrative Assistant. The Rev. John Morris, who had served as Special Assistant to Mr. Jordan, resigned in February also. And Mrs. Jerusha Brothers, formerly secretary for the VEP Research Department, became the secretary for the Executive Director of SRC. Miss Emma Jane Neelley, Research Assistant, resigned in July to take a teaching position.

Mr. John Lewis was named the new Director of VEP and assumed that position the first of March. Mr. Lewis came to VEP from the position of Director of the Community Organization Project of SRC. Before that, he had worked for the Field Foundation, and prior to that had been chairman of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and a leader in the civil rights movement. Mrs. Janet Shortt, who had formerly worked for SRC, became Mr. Lewis' secretary. In August, Miss Elzadie Bradley was employed as Administrative Aide while Mrs. Marilyn Adamson took maternity leave. In September, Miss Gloria Gaines joined VEP as secretary, and on October 1, Mrs. Shirley Cooks joined the staff as Research Associate. Marvin Wall continued as Research Director; Thaddeus Olive, Jr., as Administrative Assistant; and Charles Rooks, who had been Research Associate, became Director of Technical Assistance Programs. Miss Patricia Madsen, Research Assistant, moved to the Technical Assistance Department.

During the summer, three Urban Corps Interns worked in the VEP office. Miss Daveta DeLaughter, a senior at Morris Brown College, worked as secretary. Miss Jerrie Norris, a senior at Smith College, and William Millkey, a junior at Washington and Lee College, worked on a joint research project.

The staffs of the statewide VEP offices in North and South Carolina remained the same. In North Carolina, John Edwards continued as Director; William Towe as Research Director, and Miss Juanita Jackson as secretary. In South Carolina, Thomas Moss continued as Director, and Miss Carol Jacobs as secretary. The Louisiana VEP was closed in June, and the Director, William Samuels, entered law school at Southern University. In Arkansas, Elijah Coleman remained as Director, but Mrs. Joanna Edwards, who served as Research Director for several years, resigned because of illness. Mrs. Lorraine Walker now serves as secretary, and Mrs. Barbara Graves as part-time bookkeeper.

The staffs at the college-affiliated service centers for elected officials underwent some changes. Mrs. Taunya Banks resigned as Director of the Mississippi Center in June and her secretary, Mrs. Lillie Bell, resigned later in the fall. The Center at Talladega College in Alabama was terminated in May, and Professor Harold Franklin returned to full-time teaching at the college. At the Louisiana Center, Dr. Thomas Smith, who had been serving as part-time Director, assumed the position full-time in June. His secretary is Miss Yvette Marchelle. Mr. Sherrill Marcus, Director, and Mrs. Eva Carter, secretary, continued to operate the Miles College Center in Alabama. And the staff of the Georgia Center at Clark College, Antonio Thomas, Director, and Miss Julia Blalock, secretary, remained the same in 1970.

When VEP became a separate corporation, a new Board of Directors was named and other Board members were added later in the year. A list of the Board members can be found at the beginning of this report.

TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE-SERVICE CENTERS
SPECIAL PROJECTS

As the number of black elected officials in the South increases yearly, the Voter Education Project continues to try to maintain and develop programs which will meet some of the needs they have in performing their official duties. Most of these assistance programs are carried out by four service centers which are located at predominantly black colleges, but the state VEP offices also render some assistance to officials, and the Atlanta VEP office directly sponsors a number of assistance programs.

The report which follows is not intended to be an exhaustive accounting of every activity engaged in by one of the offices involved in this program. Instead, it mentions most of the major programs and enough of the other functions to indicate the general types of activities which are conducted. For example, numerous inquiries are received on a great variety of matters related to public officials, and these inquiries result in research reports, referrals, or development of plans for new programs, but only a few of these are mentioned in this report. Likewise, numerous materials are distributed by these offices, but most of these will not be listed specifically.

Atlanta VEP Office.--The Voter Education Project sponsored several conferences and workshops during 1970. During the spring, two meetings were held to inform black school board members throughout the South about Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act and to discuss with them ways in which they could try to improve this program in their communities. The first meeting was held in Little Rock, Arkansas, and was attended by school board members from Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Texas. School board members from Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia attended the second conference in Durham, North Carolina. Outstanding experts on Title I and other educational matters were used to conduct these meetings.

Following up these meetings, VEP distributed to school board members and numerous community leaders materials on Title I and other educational programs. At the beginning of the summer, a workshop on Title I was held in Atlanta for several community workers who would be working on Title I problems during the summer and for the service center directors and some of their interns. In addition, VEP employed a representative who spent the summer informing community groups in Arkansas about Title I and how they could get involved in their school's program. Also, VEP sponsored during the summer an intern attached to the American Friends Service Committee who worked with community groups on educational problems.

In conjunction with the Georgia Center for Elected Officials, VEP employed two students during the summer to make a study of the Title I program in Atlanta. This study developed in response to the interest of one of the members of the Board of Education. The report which grew out of this investigation will be made available to interested persons, as well as the school board and other appropriate officials.

In response to an increasing number of requests for assistance in seeking federal government programs, VEP sponsored in August a workshop for service center directors, state VEP directors, several elected officials, and a few community leaders. This three-day workshop, conducted by a professional consulting firm, instructed the participants about the nature and procedures of federal programs in several fields, including housing, economic development, neighborhood facilities, water and sewer facilities, and others.

VEP sponsored a Robert F. Kennedy Memorial Fellow who worked in Greene County, Alabama, during most of 1970. Small fellowships were granted to two of the newly-elected black sheriffs in Alabama to enable them to attend a nine-day training conference before they assumed office.

During the latter part of the year, much attention was given to organizing an internship program which would provide assistance to most of the black legislators in the South during the upcoming legislative sessions. During this period, efforts were also made to develop plans and seek support for additional programs to assist elected officials, particularly in the field of technical assistance in applying for federal programs, which VEP views as one of the most needed areas of assistance.

Talladega College.--The Talladega Service Center, which initially was given responsibility to work throughout Alabama, except for Jefferson County, was closed at the end of May, and all activities in Alabama were thereafter concentrated in the Center at Miles College. During the first months of 1970, the Talladega Center, under the part-time directorship of Professor Harold Franklin, was particularly active in working with the newly-incorporated town of Ridgeville. The Center assisted Ridgeville in securing an attorney, preparing an application for a water project grant, instructing the officials about various aspects of city government, and in starting a local newspaper. In addition to the work there, the Center gathered and distributed information and materials to a number of other officials around the state.

Miles College.--For the first half of 1970, the Miles College Center worked only in the Jefferson County (Birmingham) area, but in June the Center, under the direction of Sherrill Marcus, was given responsibility to develop a statewide program. The single most important activity which the Center sponsored during 1970 was a statewide meeting of black elected officials on December 4-6 in Montgomery. This meeting was designed to provide newly-elected officials with an orientation to their offices and incumbent or re-elected officials with additional information and advice on the continuing problems of their offices. Workshops, conducted by experts from government, academic, and private sources, were held for each office, as well as joint workshops on state and federal programs. In addition, public addresses by state, regional, and national leaders were given, and a discussion among Alabama officials laid the groundwork for creating a statewide association of black public officials. Subsequent to this meeting, the Center director continued to meet with several of the newly-elected officials to arrange further assistance for them as they assume their offices.

Among the various other activities promoted by the Center during the year were the following:

In Fairfield, the director worked with members of the city council in demonstrating the need for water and sewer improvements and investigating the prospects of securing a government grant to meet this need. Also in Fairfield, in conjunction with some of the city officials and community leaders, the Center director helped reactivate an organization concerned with housing needs; the Center then provided information, secured consultants and federal officials for weekly workshops, and helped prepare the documents required for the group to start a housing program.

At the request of a school board member, the Center played an active role in the school desegregation activities in Jefferson County. The Center helped organize a series of meetings which provided the parents with more factual information on what was going on and informed the general public of the views of the black community. Further meetings were held to deal with problems which arose during the desegregation process.

In response to several requests for assistance in economic development, the Center convened a number of meetings which brought together concerned citizens, representatives of existing non-profit corporations, and some officials. The Center then provided these people with pertinent information about their concerns and is assisting in arranging for the kind of professional consultation which they need.

During the 1969-70 school year, about twenty Miles College students served as interns with the Center. They were assigned to work with black members of the school and aldermanic boards in the several municipalities in Jefferson County. These interns assisted the officials in various ways, including filling requests for information, conducting surveys, and making observations on the content and style of the board meetings.

During the summer, four students were employed as full-time interns, and they worked in Jefferson County and in Anniston. Among the projects they worked on were a study of annexation problems in Jefferson County, preparation of booklets on Alabama government, and studies of the School Lunch and Title I programs. Their report on the Title I and School Lunch programs was given to the Human Relations Council which intends to follow through on some of the abuses which were discovered in these programs.

Southern University.--In June, Dr. Thomas Smith, who had been part-time director of the Public Affairs Service Center while serving as Assistant Professor of Political Science at Southern University, became the Center's full-time Director. This enabled the Center to give more attention to the needs of Louisiana officials and to begin developing new programs to meet these needs. A number of these new programs dealt with education. After the November elections, the director provided orientation to the newly-elected school board members. Previously the Director had consulted with a number of school board members and community leaders about the Title I program in their schools and discussed ways in which the community could appropriately participate in the planning and evaluation of these programs. The Center organized a Title I task force which is designed to coordinate the resources of the Center, the Law School, and the School of Education and make these resources available to communities which are having problems with their Title I programs. The Director has also referred officials and community leaders concerned with desegregation problems to appropriate legal groups for assistance.

Other types of officials have also requested the assistance of the Center. For example, the Director provided orientation to office for a new constable, gave legal guidance on several problems confronting an alderman, and conferred with several justices of the peace on the operation of their offices.

During the legislative session, the Center provided Representative Ernest N. Morial with two law student interns. The Center has arranged for political science majors at Southern University to serve as interns for other public officials.

The Center Director spoke to several groups on matters of concern to them and has distributed information to officials and community leaders throughout the state. For example, in addition to the educational problems mentioned above, he gave assistance on problems of reapportionment, on the fifty-three proposed amendments to the Louisiana Constitution, on the census, and on the general history of Louisiana politics and government.

One of the highlights of the year was a seminar on the Black Community and Public Service which was held on the Southern University campus. This two-day meeting involved several public officials, several faculty members, and hundreds of students in addresses and discussion on the role of black public officials and ways in which students and others could contribute to this field. One of the projects which is presently involving students and faculty in public service, the redevelopment project in Grand Coteau, was continued in 1970 with the Center being actively involved in the coordination of this program.

Tougaloo College.--For almost half of 1970, the Mississippi Center for Elected Officials did not have a director. Mrs. Taunya Banks resigned in June, and the new Director, Mr. Larry Rand, was not employed until December. During the first half of 1970, the Center conducted a number of activities, either on a statewide basis, or in response to particular requests from individual officials or communities. The Director investigated the procedures being set up for administering the 1970 Census and found several deficiencies; she then informed black officials, legal and community groups, and federal officials in an effort to insure a fair and accurate count.

In response to numerous requests for information, the Center prepared and distributed documents on the following matters: County School Board Elections; School Trustee Elections; Congressional Elections; Electoral Offices to be Filled 1970-73; Important Elections, Registration, and Qualifying Dates 1970-1973; An Explanation of the New "Open Primary" Law; Federal Housing Programs; and State Taxation.

The Center assisted Representative Robert Clark during the three-month legislative session. This assistance consisted of bill summation and analysis, as well as research on particular problems.

Among the several assistance activities which were prompted by requests from individual officials were the following:

At the request of the Chancery Clerk of Claiborne County, the Director, along with an expert on educational programs, investigated the Title I program in that county, during which several blatant violations of the program were discovered. As a result of this investigation and the ensuing letters and hearings, a new Title I coordinator was appointed to reform the program. The other incident is typical of some of the activities in which the Center has been engaged in previous years. A candidate for a vacancy on the Jonestown aldermanic board (created by the resignation of an incumbent black alderman) was denied a place on the ballot through an erroneous legal opinion about the candidate's qualification to run. After investigating the situation and checking the law, the Director involved a local civil rights attorney in the case and subsequently the candidate's name was placed on the ballot.

Clark College.-- In Georgia, unlike the other states where there are service centers, most of the black elected officials come from urban areas, and their background and needs are somewhat different from the officials who reside in small towns and rural areas. Much of the activity of the Georgia Center for Elected Officials has consisted of carrying out research projects for some of these urban officials, and this activity has resulted in unpublished reports for the use of these officials. For example, the Center has researched questions concerning city problems for the Vice-Mayor and some of the aldermen in Atlanta, and the Director has also gathered information and worked with some of the state legislators who reside in Atlanta.

In conjunction with a state legislator and an Atlanta alderman, the Center has been involved in establishing a committee on consumer affairs. This committee will accumulate data on consumer problems and assist both state legislators and city aldermen who want to introduce legislation dealing with these problems. In response to a request from a school board member, the Center in cooperation with the Atlanta VEP office, sponsored a study of the Atlanta Title I program by two student interns during the summer. The Center also is becoming involved in a study of rapid transit proposals as they affect the needs of the inter-city poor.

During the legislative session, a Robert F. Kennedy

Memorial Fellow was assigned to the Center to provide assistance to some of the state legislators. During the summer, a law student intern worked in the Center office doing research for various officials, and during the fall semester, two other interns were used by the Center, one working primarily on problems arising from the Atlanta aldermanic board, and the other working on projects requested by the Vice-Mayor of Atlanta.

All of the Center's activities have not been confined to the Atlanta area, however. For example, another law student intern was assigned during the summer to work on economic development projects with the officials in Hancock County. In response to a request from an official in Hilltonia, the Center arranged for a housing consultant to assist this official in investigating the prospects for a housing program there.

Throughout the year, the Center's Director has conducted a radio program which is designed to bring to the public the views of public officials and others on problems and events of concern to the Atlanta community. The Center has also been developing a seminar which will bring college students and public officials together for an examination of contemporary problems and the ways in which officials and community groups can tackle these problems.

RESEARCH

As part of the process of complying with the new tax law and separating from the Southern Regional Council, the Research Department of VEP worked in close cooperation with SRC, the tax lawyers, and others during the first five months of 1970.

During this time, the Research Department also moved ahead with preparation of texts for Know-Your-Government booklets on Alabama and Mississippi. The Alabama booklet now is in the editing stage, and the Mississippi booklet is in the re-write stage. Know Your Arkansas Government, written in 1969, was published in January, 1970, bringing the number of such booklets published to four. The National Roster of Black Elected Officials was published in February in cooperation with the Washington office of the Metropolitan Applied Research Center, Inc. VEP supplied the names and addresses of black elected officials in the South, and MARC obtained the lists of officials from other states. A major study, The Atlanta Elections of 1969, was published in June. The VEP Newsletter was discontinued in March with the publication of Volume IV, Numbers 1 and 2.

In February, the Research Director appeared with the Director, Mr. Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., and a former Director, Mr. Wiley A. Branton, before the U. S. Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights. The Voting Rights Act, which was the subject of their testimony, was extended by Congress in June.

The resumption of voter registration grants led this year to an unusually heavy volume of complaints and difficulties reported by registration projects. These complaints were referred by the Research Department to the Department of Justice in Washington. For example, over a period of several weeks, the Research Department relayed a series of complaints from Stewart County, Georgia, to the Justice Department, and ultimately the Justice Department sent a representative into the county.

Throughout the summer, the Research Department distributed tapes, produced by VEP urging citizens to register and vote, to more than 70 black-oriented radio stations in the South. The Research Department also produced and distributed a poster, "Hands that pick cotton . . . ," which was specially drawn for VEP. The VEP booklet, How to Conduct a Registration Campaign, went into a third printing of 10,000 copies with revisions and new material.

During the summer and fall, there was a heavy flow of requests for election information from the media, government agencies, civil rights organizations, writers, foreign visitors, and news agencies, political parties, teachers, students, and others. State-by-state voter registration estimates were revised in July and August, and again in December.

VEP was represented by the Research Director before the Fulton County Board of Registration and Elections in an effort to secure more neighborhood sites and deputies for voter registration in Atlanta's low-income areas. This effort, in which VEP was one of many participating organizations, eventually was successful.

In September, the Research Director addressed the Resurgens Club in Atlanta and analyzed the Georgia Democratic run-off election.

In October, a major research undertaking was begun. It is a county-by-county survey to determine levels of black registration in as many counties as possible in those states where official state figures are not kept by race. Tennessee was selected as the first state, and that survey is virtually complete.

In November, the Research Department conducted a survey of black candidates who had run in the general election. A report on those who had won was prepared and distributed.

Two other studies were undertaken in the fall of 1970, but they will not be ready for publication until sometime in 1971. One is a study of the 1970 gubernatorial, congressional, and county elections in the Atlanta area. This study will continue the investigation into Atlanta voting patterns which was begun with the report on the 1969 Atlanta municipal elections. The second study is an investigation of turnout and voting patterns among black voters throughout the South in the 1968 and 1970 elections.

VOTER REGISTRATION - STATEWIDE VEPS

During the first five months of 1970, VEP suspended all voter registration activity, while it was undergoing the reorganization necessary to comply with the new tax law. After June 1, however, when all the legal hurdles were overcome, VEP once again began making grants to local communities in support of registration drives.

It was September before all the problems were ironed out and sufficient funds were received to resume full-scale operations in this important program. Although there was no way to recover the crucial months lost by this delay, VEP tried to make the most of the remaining time before the November elections. A total of one hundred voter registration projects was funded before the year was out.

Major voter registration efforts during 1970 took place in Georgia, Alabama, Virginia, Tennessee, and South Carolina. Towards the end of 1970, several projects in Mississippi received funding, and in Texas VEP initiated what will hopefully be a continued participation in the Mexican-American community with the issuance of a voter registration grant.

During the past two years, more than 220,000 black people have been registered by local registration programs. Local project directors have been able, in most cases, to receive the cooperation of local registrars in carrying out registration activities. One of the major exceptions was in Stewart County, Georgia.

During 1970, the three state VEP's in North Carolina,

Arkansas, and South Carolina, held statewide meetings where people involved in local projects throughout the state attended. Workshops on voter registration and citizenship education were held. John Lewis, VEP Director, keynoted two of these meetings, stressing the need to develop a "new populism" in the South, wherein poor whites and blacks would reject racism and come together in pursuit of their many common interests through the power of the ballot. The spirit displayed by the participants in these meetings encouraged this hope.

Through its field activities, VEP attempted to assess the leadership and organization of local projects and make judgments on the probability of a successful project in particular communities. The field activities also served as a monitoring system through which VEP could insure that the local projects adhered to the guidelines governing the conduct of voter registration drives.

In this involvement with local community projects, VEP became even more impressed with the urgent need to develop programs of citizenship education which will go beyond the scope of many of the voter registration programs. Many citizens not only need assistance in gaining an entrance into the political process by registering, but they need instruction in the nature of various government programs and processes, so that their political participation can lead to meaningful results for their lives. VEP sees as one of its major tasks in the future the development of materials and programs for this purpose.

This does not mean, however, that the job of registering voters in the South is nearing completion. There remains ahead the task of reaching the almost two million unregistered black people in the South, plus the newly enfranchised eighteen-to-twenty-year-olds. Also, many of those who have registered in recent years are facing the requirement of reregistering as part of the redistricting process in some communities.

South Carolina Voter Education Project.--The South Carolina Voter Education Project was active in many voter registration and education drives in 1970, working with local civic organizations, civil rights organizations, and interested citizens. On February 4, 1970, a joint meeting of the SCVEP and the State Conference of Branches NAACP was held in Columbia to plan a statewide voter registration drive for 1970. Attending the meeting were VEP congressional district and county chairmen, local NAACP chapter representatives, and the executive committees of both organizations. The VEP district and county chairmen held several subsequent meetings to further the registration activities.

Political participation by blacks in South Carolina reached a new high during the year. The number of black registered voters increased to 221,000. A number of black candidates ran for office, and some of them were victorious, including three who won seats in the state legislature. Also several hundred blacks participated in political party precinct organizations and in county and state conventions. More than 300 black delegates attended the state conventions of the political parties in 1970. Many blacks held offices at various levels of party organization.

Although there were many gains in political participation in 1970, all problems are not yet removed. For example, in some counties registration drives met with opposition from the officials who operate the registration and electoral machinery. In Colleton County, the secretary of the county board of registration refused to register black citizens because they did not have identification numbers. These violations of the state laws were corrected by the South Carolina Voter Education Project office and the State Election Commission office. In Edgefield and Florence Counties, efforts to get blacks appointed as deputy registrars who could conduct registration throughout the county were met with opposition. In Edgefield County, the problem was ironed out by local workers and some state and county officials, but in Florence County, the complaint eventually was forwarded to the United States Department of Justice.

The SCVEP held its Sixth Annual Leadership Conference on September 19, 1970, in Columbia. In attendance were about four hundred VEP task force workers and community leaders. In addition to the keynote speech by Mr. John Lewis, Director of the Voter Education Project, three workshops were held during the conference, one on Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, one on Welfare, and one on Organizing a Community for Voter Registration and Voter Participation. Several private and government agencies cooperated in the sponsorship of these workshops.

North Carolina Voter Education Project.--Although registration activities on the part of VEP were curtailed until after mid-year, the North Carolina Voter Education Project still managed after this date to give assistance to numerous counties throughout the state in establishing and conducting voter registration drives. In addition to this registration work, the NCVEP concentrated this year on a statewide leadership conference, regional and local workshops, and the development of educational material for indigenous leaders and workers.

The Fourth Annual State Leadership Conference was held in September. Approximately four hundred persons attended the conference. The new voter registration laws were explained and the importance of the November general elections were stressed at the general sessions. Two leaflets, "Some Important Facts About the New Voter Registration Laws," and "Monitoring Public Meetings" were prepared for the conference. They were included in a kit with Know Your Government: The County Commissioners and Know Your North Carolina Government, and other educational material which was distributed at the state meeting.

Workshops were also conducted on the following topics: Voter Registration and Get-Out-The-Vote; Housing, Economic Development, Title I of the ESEA, and Monitoring Public Meetings. Mayors Howard Lee and Richard Hatcher were the speakers at the conference.

Support was given to the NCVEP First and Second Congressional District organizations. Workshops at their regional meetings and at the meetings of numerous local groups were conducted by the Director. In 1970, the focus of most of these workshops was on how to participate effectively in precinct and other meetings of political parties. The booklet, You Too Can Take Part in Precinct Meetings, and other educational material were distributed at the regional and local workshops.

As a result of this work, there was a significant increase in the number of blacks who were elected as officers, ranging from the precinct committee to the state executive committee. There was a large increase in the number of black delegates to the county, congressional, and state conventions this year.

Contact was maintained with black public officials. Requests by these officials for information and other forms of aid were serviced on an individual basis. To meet the need of black officeholders and community leaders for specialized material about the problems of a particular community, state and local laws were researched and special material prepared on such subjects as: How an Area May be Annexed Into the City Limits; How Are the Members of a School Board in a Particular County Elected; How to Obtain Water and Sewage Services, etc.

In addition to the material mentioned above, the drafts of two booklets have been completed: Know Your Government: The City Council and Where It's At in North Carolina: A Research Guide for Organizers. Comprehensive files of publications and newsclippings about state and local government affairs, federal programs, voter registration, black public officials, and political campaigns and election results were kept during 1970, as in previous years.

Arkansas Voter Education Project.--In 1970, the Arkansas

Voter Education Project placed its major emphasis on citizenship education activities. The year began and ended with special attention being given to efforts to inform communities of the importance of their involvement in the educational system. The powers of local school boards and the procedures for running for school board positions were explained to community groups throughout the state. Approximately sixty black candidates ran for school board positions in 1970, but only about five of them were successful. AVEP prepared an "Analysis of the 1970 School Elections."

Later in the year, AVEP wrote to school boards throughout the state informing them of the law which allowed an increase in school board size from five to eight members. It was suggested that this would enable the boards to appoint minority group representatives in the interim before the next regular elections.

The AVEP Annual Meeting was held in Pine Bluff in October. The morning program included presentations by the candidates (or their representatives) for governor and lieutenant governor; a keynote address by Mr. John Lewis, Executive Director of VEP; reports from across the state; and an address by Mr. Ben Grinage, former Director of AVEP, on the "War's Impact on the Poor." Mrs. Fannie Lou Hamer, noted civil rights worker from Greenville, Mississippi, spoke at the luncheon meeting. The remainder of the program consisted of workshops on: The Impact of a Unitary School System on the Black Community; The Importance of Political Involvement at the Local Level; Pros and Cons of the Proposed Constitution and Amendment 1; and Employment and Income Mantenance.

Among the other meetings which the Arkansas VEP sponsored or participated in during 1970 were the following:

In February, AVEP, along with SOME (State Organization for Minority Envolvement), conducted a two-day seminar in Hot Springs for community people from eastern and southern Arkansas. This seminar dealt primarily with ways in which communities could more effectively solve their local problems. In July, a citizenship education workshop was held by AVEP in Pine Bluff. A record number of two hundred people from across the state attended the sessions, which were concerned with four main purposes: (1) to discuss the new proposed Constitution; (2) to give a simplified explanation of the new election code; (3) to explain what the National Welfare Rights Organization is; and (4) to discuss the Title I (of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act) projects for 1970.

As usual, the Arkansas Voter Education Project worked with communities throughout the state on a number of other problems, and the Project continued to acquire and distribute resource materials which would be helpful to these communities.

With 1971 already one month old at the time of this report, we can now anticipate with enthusiasm the kinds of programming VEP will be involved in during the coming year.

Voter registration and citizenship education should take on new dimensions in the coming months, with expanded concerns in the Mexican-American, low-income white, and Spanish-speaking migrant communities. The recent Supreme Court decision allowing participation in federal elections of youth between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one certainly should be met with strong responsive action which will include assistance to registration activities among this age group.

With the election of one hundred ten black officials in the 1970 elections, we can see the results of our ongoing funding of local level registration campaigns. In 1971, VEP will continue to respond to the necessary task of reaching as many of the unregistered black voters as possible throughout the South, with special emphasis placed on areas where we have the greatest number of black people yet unregistered.

We must continue to develop the kinds of workshops and materials that can stimulate participation in the electoral process. To this end it is our hope that all aspects of VEP -- the statewide programs, the service centers, and the Atlanta office -- can explore in 1971 ways in which citizens can be assisted beyond the act of simple registration. We must give greater service to our elected officials so that they might produce greater benefits for their communities. We must better inform registered voters of how various government offices and programs affect their lives and how they can make an input into the operation of these programs. We must arm black voters with the necessary information and training to prevent electoral fraud and other maneuvers which seek to destroy the effectiveness of their recently gained franchise.

We plan to do the necessary research and prepare the appropriate materials -- both audio-visual and written -- to facilitate greater and more effective participation in their communities. And in the area of technical assistance to elected officials, we hope to expand this vitally important activity by making available to these officials specialists whose expertise can assist communities in their efforts to obtain government programs.

VEP in 1971 will thus forge ahead in its mission to remove the stumbling blocks that continue to plague minority group participation in the political process. In doing this, we will need to expand our staff and budget, develop new sources of funding, and continue to update our methods and materials so that we can be assured of the best possible results.

Introduction

Toward The Beloved Community...

By promoting minority group political participation in the South, the Voter Education Project, Inc. is ultimately working toward a goal which I like to describe as the Beloved Community—an all-encompassing, all-inclusive community of justice at peace with itself.

Gaining access to power through political involvement has been one of the single most important achievements of black Americans in recent years. We have seen the emergence of a revolutionary social and political movement—basically black and basically southern—which has the potential ultimately to make profound changes in the nature of national and international politics.

In the South, where more than half of the nation's blacks still live, the statistics of progress are impressive. Only five years ago, there were fewer than 100 black elected officials in the 11 southern states. At the end of 1971, because of increased black participation in the political process, there are 833 black officeholders in the South and literally dozens of black candidates have cleared the hurdles of two primaries in the State of Louisiana.

A significant increase in black voter registration has helped to free many black people whose lives were controlled by "white-only" politics from the local office of the justice of the peace to the halls of Congress.

While these developments are indicative of the fact that many of the most blatent barriers to black political participation have been overcome, the goal of a truly representative system of government in the South remains distant.

With over 2 million unregistered blacks over the age of 21 and the majority of 700,000 black 18-20 year-olds unregistered in the South at the beginning of 1972, it is obvious that there are still many bariers to black political participation and that much additional work is needed. Although black representation in public office continues to increase, we must face the reality that blacks are still seriously under-represented in the Southern political arena.

At the end of 1971, blacks in the South are on the verge of wielding substantial political power and making significant breakthroughs, but the promise of continued progress depends on continued and increased support for voter education and registration programs.

Political power alone cannot free people who have been enslaved for hundreds of years, but a new form of politics, the politics of hope, can be one means of building a truly democratic South. We sincerely believe that who governs does make a difference and that, through politics, we can once again place the problems of the poor and the problems of minority groups back on the American agenda.

This report contains a summary of the Voter Education Project program in 1971—a program designed to transform our rhetoric into reality. In 1971, with expanded programs of voter registration, citizenship education, and assistance to black elected officials, the VEP increased its role and its effectiveness in the South. With such innovations as the VEP voting rights tours, we have been able to communicate directly with the masses on an unprecedented scale.

At the end of this calendar year, we have little time for looking back. In many ways, we have viewed 1971 as a "dress rehearsal" for meeting the increasing needs and demands of the political year of 1972. Although the challenges and opportunities of 1972 will be far greater than any yet faced by the Voter Education Project, we are filled with a sense of hope that, with continued support and resources, we will be able to move one step closer to that Beloved Community which we seek.

The Voter Education Project, Inc.

The Voter Education Project, Inc. (VEP) is a private, nonprofit, nonpartisan tax-exempt, corporation which assists minority political participation in the 11 southern states of the Old Confederacy—Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Virginia.

History of VEP

The Voter Education Project was created in 1962 as part of the Southern Regional Council, Inc., a bi-racial organization devoted to equal opportunities for all peoples of the South.

PHASE I: 1962-1964

In 1962, legal, political, economic, and social forces conspired, often through violent means, to intimidate minority political participation in the South. As a result, fewer than 30 per cent of the South's five million voting age blacks were registered to vote. At the same time, there were no black elected officials in five of the 11 southern states and only 50 holding public office in the entire South.

The VEP was established to investigate the causes of low political participation by blacks and to involve more minority group members in the political arena. In the first phase of operations, from 1962 through 1964, the VEP funded local voter registration drives, largely through major civil rights organizations. As a result of these early efforts, back voter registration in the South increased by 700,000 in the period from 1962 through 1964. At the end of 1964, there were still fewer than 100 black elected officials in the South.

PHASE II: 1966-1969

Years of anguish and struggle for the right to vote came to a head in 1965 when a small but courageous band of demonstrators attempted to march from Selma to Montgomery, Alabama, to dramatize the denial of voting rights. The nonviolent marchers were set upon by policemen and brutally beaten—a bloody event which, as a result of public outrage, created a climate of support for the passage of the Voting Rights Act of 1965.

Selma, Alabama—the struggle that won the right to vote. . .

Greater black political advances were possible after the enactment of the 1965 Voting Rights Act struck down literacy tests and other discriminatory devices which had been used to keep blacks from the ballot.

In 1966, the Voter Education Project re-organized a program of voter education and registration to take advantage of improved conditions under the new law. Unlike the first phase of VEP operations, allocations for voter registration were made directly to purely local community organizations which had been formed or were then emerging throughout the region.

In the period from early 1966 through 1969, the Voter Education Project, in a massive effort to increase the number of black voters, funded more than 600 local projects in the 11 southern states. In the first year after the Voting Rights Act, black voter registration in some states rose 50 to 60 per cent. Overall in the South, more than a million black citizens became registered to vote between 1965 and 1969.

As black voter registration activity increased sharply in this period, there was a corresponding increase in the number of blacks who were being elected to public office. For the most part, these officials did not have the benefit of previous experience in government, so the VEP began to develop programs to assist them in the performance of their duties.

The VEP expanded its scope of operations by creating the service centers for elected officials on black college campuses in four states and, in addition, began to administer its program through the four statewide field offices.

In 1970, VEP separated from the Southern Regional Council and became an independent corporation, largely as a result of the 1969 Tax Reform Law. One of the most serious problems arising from the new law was that no more than 25 per cent of VEP's funds could come from a single source—a sharp blow to an organization dependent on a few foundations for funding.

For a time, the very existence of the VEP was in serious question. The process of legally separating the two organizations and gaining a tax-exempt status for the newly incorporated VEP continued through May of 1970. During this period, many of VEP's activities were curtailed and its voter registration program was completely suspended. However, by the end of 1970, the Voter Education Project had regained momentum and again resumed the operation of a comprehensive program.

Board Members. When the VEP became a separate corporation in 1970, a new Board of Directors was named and, later in the year, more members were added. In 1971, the Board was again expanded to provide greater representation throughout the region.

Program. Program areas for the VEP were classified into four major categories—voter registration, citizenship education, assistance to black elected officials, and research.

Administration. The 1971 VEP program was administered by the staff of the regional office headquarters in Atlanta, Georgia, the statewide VEP field offices in Arkansas, North Carolina, and South Carolina, and the service centers for elected officials in Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Mississippi. All VEP offices were involved to varying degrees in the administration of the four program areas. In brief, the organizational structure is:

Atlanta Regional Office. Under the supervision of the executive and deputy directors, who oversee the entire VEP operation, the staff of the regional office in 1971 included the following components: field, research, special projects, communications, financial, printing, and secretarial.

Statewide Field Offices. Each field office was staffed by a state director and a secretary. In addition, the North Carolina VEP had a research associate.

Service Centers for Elected Officials. Each service center was staffed by a director and a secretary.

Funding. Historically, the VEP had been funded by foundations. In 1971, support was received from the Carnegie Corporation, The Field Foundation, The Ford Foundation, The New World Foundation, Rockefeller Brothers Fund, New York Foundation, Irwin-Sweeney-Miller Foundation, Cummins Engine Foundation, Youth Action Fund, and the Youth Citizenship Fund.

As a result of the conditions placed on the organization by the 1969 Tax Reform Law, in 1971 it became necessary for the VEP to seek to broaden its base of support by appealing directly to private citizens throughout the country. The gratifying response was an indication that many progressive individuals throughout the nation support the VEP efforts to achieve real democracy in the South.

Voter Registration

Voter registration has proven to be the key to black advances in the political arena. It has been responsible for an increase in the number of black elected officials and has increased the sensitivity of white politicians to their black constituents.

In 1971, there were still approximately two and one-half million unregistered voting age blacks, including 18-to-20 year olds. Thus a major emphasis of the VEP in 1971 was the continuation of voter registration programs which had proven to be effective and the implementation of new programs to reach unregistered minority group members.

Voter registration efforts by the VEP in 1971 included a system of allocating funds to local organizing efforts, assistance by staff members of the VEP regional and field offices, and a program of intern participation in four states.

GRANTS TO LOCAL GROUPS

In 1971, the Voter Education Project made grants to local voter registration groups in all eleven southern states. Under the VEP grant program, local community organizations must demonstrate the need for registration in their area and indicate in a written proposal the methods which will be used in organizing. The typical grant in 1971, ranging from $500 to $2,000, helped to defray unavoidable costs of local training workshops, publicity, canvassing, and transportation offices. For a state-by-state breakdown of voter registration and citizenship education grants and activities, see pages 22-23.

STAFF ASSISTANCE TO LOCAL EFFORTS

The staff members of the Atlanta regional office and the statewide field offices of the VEP played a continuing role of providing assistance to local voter registration groups in 1971.

Primary responsibility for the allocation of grants to local voter registration projects was centered in the Atlanta regional office. There the staff, primarily the field department, reviewed all program proposals and carried out the project selection process.

Under VEP guidelines, each local group which received VEP support was required to file a weekly progress report with the regional office. In addition, regional office staff maintained communication with local projects by telephone and by occasional field trips to the local registration projects in states with no VEP field office. By these means, the VEP was able to provide technical assistance to the local groups as the need arose.

In Arkansas, North Carolina, and South Carolina, the statewide VEP staffs also reviewed local voter registration proposals, provided registration materials, and visited local project areas to set up workshops and assist in organizing and conducting registration programs. To a lesser degree, the four VEP service centers monitored registration projects within their geographic areas of responsibility.

VOTER REGISTRATION INTERN PROGRAM

As a means of providing full-time assistance to local voter registration efforts, the VEP in 1971 sponsored summer intern programs in four states—Arkansas, Louisiana, North Carolina, and South Carolina.

In Arkansas, the four interns involved in the ten-week 1971 summer program assisted in adding hundreds of new voters to the rolls in a three-county area. The program was coordinated by the Arkansas Voter Education Project.

In Louisiana, five summer interns worked in an eight parish (county) area, concentrating their efforts in areas with heavy black populations.

In North Carolina and South Carolina, eight summer interns were assigned to communities which had received VEP grants. Under the direction of the North Carolina Voter Education Project, the interns assisted community people in voter registration drives and citizenship education programs.

VOTING RIGHTS ENFORCEMENT

Enforcement of the provisions of the Voting Rights Act was a concern of the Voter Education Project in 1971. Throughout the year, the VEP served as a liasion between local registration groups and the U. S. Department of Justice in reporting allegations of voting rights violations.

A process of reregistration in Mississippi, approved belatedly by the Department of Justice, was sharply criticized by the VEP as an attempt to roll back black voting rights progress of recent years. In June, the VEP executive director testified on the matter before a House Judiciary Subcommittee in Washington. The subcommittee, after the hearings and investigations, concurred that the Department of Justice should have objected to the Mississippi reregistration.

Because of the reregistration process, the VEP asked that the Mississippi voter registration deadline be extended and that federal examiners be sent into the state to continue registration. Examiners were sent into three Mississippi counties, resulting in the registration of 1,311 persons.

Weapon of Change

John Lewis, director of the Atlanta-based Voter Education Project, was in Washington this Week, offering in testimony before a congressional subcommittee somewhat melancholy comment on the successes and failures of the effort to make black Americans part of the political processes in the South.

Lewis heads a non-partisan organization which helps direct and encourage black voter registration efforts in 11 Southern states.

Commenting on the effects of the federal Voting Rights Act, Lewis noted that until its passage in 1965 there were fewer than 100 black elected officials at any level in the South. Today, six years later, there are almost 700 black elected officials.

The number of black registered voters has increased dramatically across the South. In Mississippi for example, the total figure has moved from 28,000 to roughly 280,000.

There have been enormous strides made in seeing to it that black Americans be accorded the full rights of citizenship, Lewis indicated, but there also continue to be unhappy pockets of resistence to change, where black citizens are still discouraged from registering to vote, even if by methods far more subtle than a decade or so ago.

There is still violence in the South, aimed at black people. Lewis noted that such violence is far less than a few years ago but it is with us yet, as witness the apparently senseless slaying only days ago of a black high school girl in Drew, Mississippi. As Lewis commented, in a poignant aside: "Too many of us have attended too many funerals in the South."

Lewis' statement to the congressional subcommittee is a balanced one, taking into account both progress and continued difficulties in the battle for racial justice. We especially agree with one of his concluding comments, that the "power of the ballot can be a mighty weapon of change."

Citizenship Education

In 1971, the VEP utilized a variety of educational vehicles to promote citizenship education. Since citizenship education is often an integral part of the process of voter registration efforts, it is difficult to define this program area in isolation. For instance, citizens who have never registered to vote must first become acquainted with the importance of participation in decision-making and understand the nature of government positions and programs. In another example, the VEP voting rights tours described in this section were citizenship education efforts directed toward the end of voter registration.

VOTING RIGHTS TOURS

For the first time in the history of the Voter Education Project, highly visible and well-publicized non-partisan voting tours were conducted in three southern states in 1971. The tours, which featured VEP executive director John Lewis and Julian Bond, a VEP board member, provided a vehicle for reaching large numbers of unregistered minority voters in Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida.

The voting rights tours dramatized the potential of the black vote and encouraged the registration of minority group members in both rural and urban areas of the South. Prospective voters were reached through a series of public speaking appearances, rallies, and canvassing efforts in each state.

The tours also contributed toward keeping alive the spirit of hope and movement which has characterized many areas of the South since the dramatic days of the civil rights movement in the 1960's.

Mississippi Voting Rights Tour. In Mississippi, Lewis and Bond made more than 39 stops in 25 counties from June 22 through June 30, 1971. Their agenda included speeches in churches, schools, clubs, and public buildings throughout the state. During the days, they met and talked with potential black voters wherever they could be found — in their homes, on the street, in the cotton fields, and in pool halls.

Since both Lewis and Bond had been active participants of the civil rights movement in the South in the 1960's, they were no strangers to the black masses of Mississippi. The warm response reflected the continuation of the vitality and commitment which has characterized the Mississippi civil rights movement for many years. Local voter registration workers reported that the tour was quite effective in boosting their efforts and had the effect of mobilizing large numbers of unregistered voters.

As stated by John Lewis, "Our trip was an attempt to conquer the fear that black citizens have. We had to demonstrate to the people of Mississippi that they were not alone in their struggle. We did not tell them who to vote for or what political party to join, but simply that they could begin to control their own destiny by registering to vote."

Louisiana Voting Rights Tour. The second successful VEP voting rights tour was conducted in Louisiana. The central focus of the Louisiana effort was a 15-parish area where approximately 70,000 blacks of voting age were yet unregistered.

The Louisiana tour, which officially opened with addresses at Southern University in Baton Rouge on August 2, 1971, and continued through August 5, was similar in many respects to the Mississippi tour. Lewis and Bond, in 33 public appearances, pointed out that over 200,000 blacks in Louisiana were yet unregistered.

Florida Voting Rights Tour. A two-day VEP voting rights tour of Florida, which began on August 29, 1971, consisted of a whirl-wind schedule of visits to nine urban centers from the southeastern town of Homestead to the northwestern area of Tallahassee.

The Florida tour was an attempt to mobilize minority voters who reside primarily in major metropolitan centers including Miami, Tampa, Orlando, and Jacksonville.

"Florida, unlike Mississippi and Louisiana, does not have a state-wide civil rights movement," commented Julian Bond. "It was our hope that the VEP drive could, through statewide voter registration efforts, tie together minority communities which have been separated in spirit and organization as well as by georgraphy."

RADIO TAPES

In 1970, the VEP had distributed tape recordings encouraging voter registration to black-oriented radio stations throughout the South. Due to a continuing demand for these one-minute spot announcements, additional tapes were made and distributed in 1971.

In conjunction with the voting rights tours, John Lewis and Julian Bond also made a series of promotional tapes to be used by radio stations in areas where voter registration and educational efforts were concentrated.

WRITTEN MATERIALS

The VEP continued the distribution of basic citizenship education handbooks in 1971 and issued several new publications.

A basic series of "Know Your Government" handbooks distributed in 1971 examined in detail various governmental positions and agencies and their duties and responsibilities. Other materials detailed the process of organizing registration campaigns, registering to vote, participating in precinct meetings, understanding the responsibilities of election officials, and acting as poll-watchers. For a complete listing of VEP publications, see page 24.

AUDIO-VISUAL PROGRAM

A series of slides and tape presentations were developed for use in a six-county area of Mississippi in the fall of 1971. The presentations described the form and contents of the paper, computer, and voting machine ballots in an effort to prepare black citizens to cast an effective ballot in the statewide general elections.

The audio-visual presentations were developed by the VEP staff and subsequently distributed throughout the six-county area by volunteer workers. The program was a six-week effort and was utilized in more than ninety communities.

CITIZENSHIP EDUCATION CLASSES

In addition to the citizenship education components of most local voter registration programs, the VEP sponsored citizenship education classes which were conducted by the Tombigbee Council on Human Relations. These classes, attended by over 800 black citizens, were held in a five-county area of Mississippi in October, 1971.

The class format included short lectures by trained instructors, the distribution of political handbooks describing the government structures and election procedures in each county, group discussions, and practice voting.

ARKANSAS CITIZENSHIP EDUCATION CONFERENCE

In February, the Arkansas Voter Education Project held a political seminar in Little Rock which attracted 150 participants. Topics discussed included methods of participating in the political process, community organizing, local election laws, and the Arkansas Election Code.

NORTH CAROLINA CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT MEETINGS

Citizenship education workshops and meetings were held in four congressional districts in North Carolina. In February, a joint meeting of the First and Second Districts discussed the involvement of black parents in the public schools. The first meeting of the Third and Seventh Districts was organized in March and, after that session, separate district meetings continued. Topics discussed in the district meetings included registration drives, duties of elected officials, changes in election laws and regulations, and future political events in the state.

YOUTH PROGRAMS

In June, 1971, the scope of political activities was broadened as the last necessary state ratified the 26th amendment to the United States Constitution and 18-to-20 year olds were given the right to the ballot in federal, state, and local elections.

The VEP projectd that, by 1972, there would be 1,250,000 blacks between the ages of 18 and 23 in the South. Responding to the challenge of registering these new young voters, the VEP placed an emphasis on youth mobilization programs in conjunction with local voter registration efforts. The VEP encouraged the use of citizenship education materials which would attract and involve this important political populace in electoral activity.

At Southern University in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, a voter education drive was conducted by the VEP service center to involve the newly enfranchised 18-to-20 year old student population. The drive included the distribution of educational materials, canvassing to reach unregistered students, and ultimately the actual registration of students at a temporary registrar's office which had been set up on the campus.

In December, 1971, a Youth Leadership Training Conference was held at North Carolina Central University. Over 300 young participants attended the workshop sessions, sponsored by the North Carolina Voter Education Project, to discuss youth registration, citizenship education, and electoral politics.

In Alabama, two youth meetings were convened by the Alabama Center for the purpose of coordinating youth voter registration campaigns. Both meetings were held in Montgomery and were attended by students from high schools, colleges, and communities from across the state. Several communities and institutions represented at the meetings followed up by conducting voter registration campaigns and formalizing organizational structures to continue their efforts.

The Arkansas VEP worked to help organize youth groups in Little Rock, Dermott, Parksdale, Wilmot, and Pine Bluff. In Little Rock, work was coordinated with the Mayor's Youth Conference.

A VEP registration campaign, organized in Madison County, Mississippi by the Mississippi Service Center, sought to register Tougaloo College students. The voter drive was initially interrupted by local officials, but later resumed after a Justice Department ruling that students should be allowed to register if they had not done so in their home towns. When the situation was again reversed by the Mississippi Attorney General, a suit was filed and a restraining order allowed continued registration of students until a hearing could be arranged.

LOCAL CITIZENSHIP EDUCATION PROJECTS

As previously stated, many local voter registration projects also incorporated citizenship education components in their programs. A complete listing of local voter registration/citizenship education projects which received VEP support in 1971 is found on pages 22-23.

"CHICAGO" CONCERT REGISTRATION TOUR

The big-band rock group, Chicago, conducted a southern tour on October 19-31, 1971, and combined their musical program with a voter education effort. In coordination with the VEP, the tour agenda included distribution of citizenship education materials and, in some instances, involved actual registration of young voters. The tour visited 12 cities in Louisiana, Arkansas, Alabama, Georgia, and Florida.

VEP NEWSLETTER

The VEP NEWS, which had been discontinued in March of 1970, was resumed as a periodic publication to disseminate information to southern minority group members and the general public. Resumption of the publication began with the April-June, 1971 issue, Volume 5, Number 1.

Technical Assistance to Black Officials

As the number of black elected officials continues to increase in the southern states, there is a corresponding need for expanded programs of technical assistance. It is critical that black officials, long denied the opportunity to hold elected offices, be given every opportunity to demonstrate that they can, through their public positions, bring significant benefits to their constituents.

The VEP, through its regional office, the statewide VEP offices, and the field service centers, administered specialized programs, sponsored workshops, supplied legal and professional consultation, and provided interns for black elected officials in 1971. Highlights of these activities follow.

VEP SERVICE CENTERS

Georgia Service Center for Elected Officials. The staff of the Georgia Service Center, located at Clark College, Atlanta, Georgia, responded to numerous requests for technical assistance, research data and materials, and information from black elected officials. As a means of establishing a communications link between black elected officials and various black community organizations and individuals, the Center published and distributed a newsletter.

At the request of one staff official, the Center conducted a consumer affairs project. In addition to participating in the legislative intern program in Georgia, (described elsewhere in this section), the Center also sponsored interns who worked with two black elected officials in the city of Atlanta.

In Augusta, the Center was active in assisting black members of the city council in the implementation of recommendations contained in the National Urban Audit.

Alabama Center for Elected Officials. The Alabama Center at Miles College in Birmingham convened a number of special meetings for black elected officials. A meeting of circuit clerks was held in Montgomery to discuss the duties, responsibilities, and experiences of that office. Other special meetings included sheriffs who met at Tuskegee and Montgomery, coroners who met in Montgomery, school board members who met in Montgomery, and municipal officials who met in Birmingham.

A meeting of black elected officials in Alabama was held on July 31 in Birmingham, where black legislators gave a review of the 1971 legislative sessions. After the review, the officials held a business session which led to the establishment of a new organization—the Black Elected Officials of Alabama.

Through the Alabama Center, the VEP provided the following assistance to black elected officials in Greene County: legal consultation, assistance in housing and law enforcement, assistance in setting up a teacher training/black skills program, bookkeeping, and other forms of assistance to the circuit clerk.

The Center initiated a series of conferences which resulted in the formation of the Housing Resource Service of Alabama, Inc., a non-profit agency set up to aid minority and low income persons in securing decent housing.

More than 3,000 volumes of books, were donated to the Center. At the request of the mayors, these books were distributed to the Hobson City Library and to Roosevelt City for use in tutorial and other reading projects.

In addition to these programs, the Center staff responded to numerous specific requests for assistance from local black officials throughout the state, maintained a research library, and distributed educational materials to black officials and citizens.

MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA—Representative Thomas Reed (standing), a member of the House Legislative Education Committee, addresses meeting convened by the Alabama Center for Elected Officials.

Louisiana Public Affairs Service Center. One of the most significant contributions of the Center's staff at Southern University in Baton Rouge was its research and work in the area of legislative redistricting and reapportionment. At the request of black officials, the Center Staff was active in providing research for the development of a reapportionment plan which would provide an equitable increase in minority group representation in the Louisiana legislature.

The Center also provided effective assistance to local black officials in developing reapportionment plans for police juries and school boards.

Continuing in its role as a resource agency for black elected officials in Louisiana, the Center provided office orientation or a number of black elected officials. The Center responded to requests for clarification of election laws and regulations, general information, and requests for more detailed assistance.

Mississippi Center for Elected Officials. Beginning with a statewide conference of black elected officials in January, 1971, the Center, located at Tougaloo College in Tougaloo, attempted to learn of the needs of black officeholders and to acquaint them with the potential of the Center's resources. As a follow-up, several political education workshops were set up to examine registration, redistricting, candidacies, and poll-watching.

Since 1971 was an important election year in Mississippi, the Center staff was called upon to produce many research publications. These publications included an election manual, state government manual, black voter statistics, explanation of the re-registration process in Mississippi, detailed descriptions of various local, county, and state offices, explanation of candidate's qualifying procedures, and clarification of the overturn of the Open Primary Law.

In July, the Center conducted an election law workshop for black elected officials and candidates in Madison County in which changes in Mississippi laws were noted and the regulations were clarified.

Throughout the summer and fall, the center served an important function by receiving, investigating, and attempting to conciliate complaints which frequently arose as black candidates entered the political arena. Such situations included the importation of white election managers from other areas into predominantly black districts and the disqualification of black candidates because of extremely minor errors on qualifying forms. During the election period, the Center assisted in efforts to establish the most extensive network of black pollwatchers in Mississippi electoral history.

After the elections, the Center began an analysis of black participation in the election and immediately arranged a workshop session for newly-elected black county officeholders to prepare them to meet the challenge of their offices.

LEGISLATIVE INTERN PROGRAM

Each of the service centers of the VEP participated in the supervision of legislative interns. The interns worked with black legislators in every southern state except Arkansas, which has not yet elected any blacks to its state house. Most of the 27 interns in the ten-state area assisted the legislators on a full-time basis for the duration of the legislative sessions.

The interns were involved in research on problems of concern for the legislators, analyzed pending bills, attended committee meetings and public hearings on behalf of the legislators, acted as liaison agents with government agencies, prepared news releases, answered mail, and responded to requests from constituents.

In addition to the legislative interns, the VEP also provided interns to several black municipal officials, including the mayor of Chapel Hill, North Carolina, the vice-mayors of Richmond, Virginia and Atlanta, Georgia, and a black alderman in Atlanta.

SOUTHWIDE LEGISLATIVE REAPPORTIONMENT CONFERENCE

At the request of several black state legislators, the VEP staff in Atlanta convened a conference to discuss congressional and state reapportionment and redistricting. Over half the black legislators in the South attended the meeting in Atlanta on June 11 and 12, 1971.

The conference was coincidentally held shortly after two court decisions relating to the question of reapportionment were announced. The meeting, which included addresses by several experts on reapportionment and redistricting, was considered quite beneficial in that most state legislatures in the South had to deal with this crucial issue in 1971.

HOUSING CONFERENCE FOR NORTH CAROLINA OFFICIALS

The North Carolina Voter Education Project (NCVEP) sponsored a conference in Raleigh on July 16 and 17 to familiarize the state's black elected officials with funding programs and opportunities available throughout the U. S. Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD). The Conference included a series of concurrent workshops on such topics as water and sewer grants, public housing, neighborhood facilities, and rent supplement programs.

VIRGINIA STATE CONFERENCE FOR ELECTED OFFICIALS

A working session for the benefit of black elected officials in Virginia was held in Richmond in December. The purpose of the conference was to help prepare the officials, especially those newly-elected, to meet the challenges of their positions.

Research

Basic to the implementation of workable programs in voter registration, citizenship education, and assistance to officials is a strong foundation of research. The following activities illustrate the inter-relatedness of research with other VEP program areas:

VOTER REGISTRATION

A major and continuing research effort performed by the VEP is the collection of statistics on current voting age population and voter registration by race in the 11 southern states. With the publication of the 1970 population statistics by the U. S. Bureau of the Census, the VEP in 1971 began to compile a new county-by-county breakdown of voter registration in the South.

Also in the area of voter registration, the VEP staff compiled, digested, recorded, and filed incoming research reports from local groups engaged in voter registration efforts.

CITIZENSHIP EDUCATION

One of the most important research functions is the collection of information for the publication of citizenship education materials. Included in 1971 VEP activities were research efforts in the preparation of booklets, leaflets, newsletters, and reports. A list of VEP publications is included in this report on page 24.

ASSISTANCE TO OFFICIALS

A continuing research project for the VEP is the maintenance of a current roster of black elected officials in the South. This data is constantly updated and revised because elections are held throughout each calendar year in several southern states. The VEP published data on black elected officials twice in 1971—first in August, when there were 735 black elected officials, and again at the end of December, when the number had increased to 833.

As indicated in the previous program area, many of the requests received by the VEP from black elected officials involved a substantial degree of research. Although many of the requests received in 1971 were highly specialized and were crucial only in limited geographic areas, there were exceptions to this generalization. One example is the VEP research requested by black Georgia legislators—data which helped provide the basis for a successful challenge of the state's racially discriminatory reapportionment plan.

ELECTIONS CALENDAR

In 1971, the research staff initiated the collection of data which will ultimately be published in the form of an elections calendar. The calendar will include qualifying deadlines, election dates, and terms of office for many municipal elected positions and all county and state positions in the 11 southern states.

YOUTH POLITICS

Research on minority youth potential in the southern political system was a priority item in the latter part of the year. The VEP was concerned with identifying the locations and numbers of black and Mexican-American youth throughout the South.

1968 ELECTION ANALYSIS

A research effort begun in 1971 and scheduled for publication in early 1972 was a study of black participation in the 1968 presidential election and black representation at the national conventions. This research effort will provide black citizens and the major political parties a yardstick by which to measure "adequate and fair representation" at national conventions in the decade of the 1970's.

SCHOOL BOARD SURVEY

The North Carolina VEP distributed a questionnaire to the approximately 140 school boards in the state. The data obtained will assist the NCVEP in preparing for more intensive work with the more than 60 black school board members in that state.

DELEGATE SELECTION RESEARCH

In October of 1971, the VEP initiated an intensive non-partisan research study of state statutes and major political party regulations relating to the process of delegate selection to the 1972 presidential conventions. This comprehensive research, concluded in December, will be the basis for a series of handbooks, one for each southern state, to be published in 1972 to encourage grassroots participation in the delegate selection process.

RESEARCH INTERNS

The VEP research effort was assisted by summer interns secured through the Atlanta Urban Corps. The interns, whose period of service ranged from one to three months, assisted in the development of citizenship education materials on state and local government, the analysis of grant records of past VEP-supported local projects, and the statistical investigation of minority group youth in the South. Several interns remained with the VEP program into the fall of 1971.

1971 ELECTION SURVEY

In November and December, 1971, the VEP conducted a survey of the offices won by blacks throughout the year. This research served as the basis for a published report on black electoral activity in 1971.

NCVEP RESEARCH

The North Carolina VEP completed a variety of research efforts in 1971. These efforts included election law research, a state-wide election calendar, handbooks for voters in several congressional districts, a research guide for organizers, a state-wide black population analysis, a summary of black voter registration statistics for the state, a study of barriers to black political participation, and the completion of drafts of several "Know Your Government" handbooks for other states in the South. (See list of VEP Publications, page 24.)

CHANGING PRECINCT RESEARCH SURVEY

A VEP-supported survey of a selected precinct in Atlanta, Georgia, was begun in October to determine if the voter registration list contained an inaccurately high number of white voters who had moved from that area to the suburbs. The survey was also to measure the extent to which black voters who move from one section of the city to another continue to vote in the precinct of their old address.

SOUTHERN BLACK POLITICAL RESEARCH

The VEP issued a research grant in November to the Institute for Southern Studies to analyze the development of southern black politics in the 1960's, with emphasis on the challenge movements which have taken place in several states.

NASHVILLE-DAVIDSON COUNTY, TENNESSEE ELECTION RESEARCH

A survey of black political participation in the 1971 Nashville municipal elections was completed and published in the VEP NEWS, Vol. 5, No. 2.

Projection '72

In 1972, the Voter Education Project will continue its non-partism efforts in the four program areas, but will increase staff involvement in organizing local communities to make greater use of the power of the ballot.

Most of the programs of the VEP in the past have been geared toward the development of political participation in the black community. This primary emphasis will continue, but there is now a need for a broader vision and a more comprehensive program.

In the year ahead, the VEP will begin to organize poor whites and Mexican-Americans—an important step toward developing meaningful alliances and coalitions with other groups whose resources have been exploited by the same social, economic and political structures. Within the new scope of VEP operations, the organizing of 18-to-20 year-olds to participate in the southern political system will receive high priority.

The VEP program projection for 1972 is an ambitious one which will require increased financial support. The need to continue support for the democratic revolution which is sweeping the South today must not be over-shadowed by the illusory glamor of the 1972 presidential campaigns.

The Voter Education Project is committed to continue its work of the past decade to made the dreams and aspirations of minority political participation a reality in the South. The VEP is confident that it will receive the urgently needed support from foundations, groups, and individuals of good will.

In this decade, the nation cannot be allowed to retreat from the needs of the present and the promises of the future.

Financial Report

Board of Directors
Voter Education Project, Inc.

We have examined the statement of assets and liabilities resulting from cash transactions of Voter Education Project, Inc. (a non-profit Georgia corporation) as of December 31, 1971 and the related statements of cash revenues and expenditures of the various funds and changes in fund balances for the year then ended. Our examination was made in accordance with generally accepted auditing standards, and accordingly included such tests of the accounting records and such other auditing procedures as we considered necessary in the circumstances.

In our opinion, the financial statements referred to above present fairly the assets and liabilities of Voter Education Project, Inc., at December 31, 1971, arising from cash transactions, and the revenues collected and expenditures disbursed by it during the year then ended, on a basis consistent with that of the preceding period.

AUDITORS' REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTAL INFORMATION

Voter Education Project, Inc.

The basic financial statements of Voter Education Project, Inc. for the year ended December 31, 1971 and our report thereon, are presented in the preceding section of this report. Our examination was made primarily for the purpose of formulating an overall opinion on those financial statements. The supplemental statement presented hereinafter, although not considered necessary for a fair presentation of financial position and results of operations, is presented as supplementary information and has been subjected to the audit procedures applied in the examination of the basic financial statements. In our opinion, the supplemental statement is fairly stated in all material respects in relation to the basic financial statements taken as a whole.

BLACK ELECTED OFFICIALS IN THE SOUTH

February 3, 1972

Voter Education Project, Inc.
52 Fairlie Street, Atlanta, Georgia 30303

INTRODUCTION

Since the passage of the Voting Rights Act in 1965, the increase of one and one-half million black voters in the South has brought about a corresponding increase in the total number of black elected officeholders in the eleven southern states.

Prior to the passage of the Voting Rights Act, the number of southern black elected officials was fewer than 100. By 1966, that number had increased to 159. The number continued to rise with 385 in December, 1968, 644 in November, 1970, 735 in August, 1971, to the present figure of 873 in February, 1972.

While these figures represent the beginnings of substantial changes in the southern political process, one must be aware that the current total of black elected officials represents only a fraction of the total number of elected positions in the South. This means that blacks are still seriously under-represented in the political arena and that conscientious efforts to increase black political participation must continue.

This is the second publication of BLACK ELECTED OFFICIALS IN THE SOUTH. The first roster, published in January, 1969, was assembled in preparation for the Southwide Conference of Black Elected Officials in December of 1968. To the best of our knowledge, this second roster is complete and accurate as of February, 3, 1972. It gives the names, addresses, and titles of black men and women who hold elective office on the local and state level in the South.

There has been a significant decrease in the number of officials in Alabama. This is because there are no longer any justices of peace in that state. Justices of peace courts in Alabama were abolished by referendum on January 18, 1972. Thus, Alabama's roster decreased by 16.

From time to time, this roster will be updated. Therefore, we welcome corrections and additions. We also urge all who see this roster to send newsclips or magazine articles about black candidates and officials, both appointed and elected, to the Research Department, Voter Education Project, Inc., 52 Fairlie Street, N. W., Suite 360, Atlanta, Georgia 30303.

Information RE: RANDOLPH COUNTY, ALABAMA

Emory Via Memo to the Files

It is my understanding that Mr. Terry offered assistance to the Hancock County, Georgia Sewing Industry efforts. He perhaps leased machines to them. However, I understand there has been some flap because he took some of his machines back. McCown evidently feels quite strongly about this incident.

At one time Mr. Terry had offered to assist in setting-up a cut-and-sew shop in Greene County, Alabama. This fell through. Reasons are unknown.

Ron Parker who has been with Atlanta University has worked in Hancock County on their industrial development efforts. Winifred Greene feels he would be a good contacy regarding what happened in Hancock County. Bill Eisenhower in the AFSC office would know how to reach Parker.

Dispute Over Welfare Rights

ALABAMA CASE IS A VICTORY

FOR 4,000 CHILDREN

WIDOW BRINGS SUIT WHEN AID TO DEPENDENT CHILDREN BENEFITS ARE CUT OFF

In October, 1966, Mrs. Sylvester Smith, once-widowed, once-deserted, 34 years old and black, was notified by the Department of Pensions and Security of Dallas County, Alabama, that it was cutting off payments to her family under the Aid to Dependent Children program. This meant a loss of about $29 a month, more than a quarter of the Smith household income. It also signaled the beginning of a momentous test, resolved by the United States Supreme Court several weeks ago, of a state's power to deprive children of aid to which they are entitled by a Federal welfare program.

At a time when bureaucracy's entire approach to the poor was coming under radical scrutiny, the Court delivered a blow to state authorities, Northern as well as Southern, who have been withholding Federal dollars from residents because of race, sexual activity or other matters irrelevant to their need.

The Smith decision, beneficently affecting more than 21,000 children in Alabama and perhaps as many as 400,000 throughout the country, was the first handed down by the high court in a dispute over public welfare; it will assuredly not be the last. Like Linda Brown, the schoolgirl from Topeka who won the 1954 school-integration decision, and Clarence Earl Gideon, the Florida convict whose right to an attorney was upheld in 1963, Mrs. Sylvester Smith has set in motion a dramatic change in American society.

MORE THAN HALF OF ADC FUNDS COME FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

In first giving aid to Mrs. Smith and then taking it away, Alabama was acting as an agent of the Federal Government, which set up the A. D. C. program under the Social Security Act. Last year, Washington contributed more than half of the $2.3-billion paid to some 4.2 million children around the country. In rich states such as New York the Federal share drops; in poor states such as Alabama it rises. Family payments vary according to need and number of children; in Alabama they average around $15 a child each month -- about half the established level of "need."

Designed to help children who have been deprived of a parent by death, incapacity or simply by "continued absence from the home," A. D. C. has for years been under attack from those who see it as an inducement to immoral behavior, especially among Negroes. "By taxing the good people to pay for these programs," said the esteemed Govenor Orval Faubus of Arkansas in 1959, "we are putting a premium on illegitimacy never before known in the world."

Mrs. Smith's children met all the original requirements for aid, but they did not qualify under one regulation that Alabama, along with most other states of the Old Confederacy and a number in the North, had added. The Smith children were ruled ineligible because their mother was thought to be maintaining a continuing sexual relationship with a "substitute father" -- who, presumably, was expected to help support the children. Some form of the substitute-father rule was instituted in Alabama, Arkansas, Arizona, Connecticut, the District of Columbia, Indiana, Louisiana, Maine, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Mexico, North and South Carolina, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont and Virginia.

JOBS PAY SO LITTLE THAT MRS. SMITH NEVER COULD GET OFF ADC

Mrs. Smith first applied for A. D. C. in March, 1956, a few months after her husband was killed "in a fight over a woman." She was 23 years old and was left with three children -- Ida Elizabeth, 3; Ernestine, 2, and Willie Lewis, 6 months. Aid was granted. In January, 1957, she had her fourth child, Willie James, the son of one Lois Fuller. Willie James was added to the A. D. C. lists in June, 1963, after Fuller left town, presumably for New York. The Smith family received about $67 a month until March, 1966, when Ida Elizabeth, 13 years old and unmarried, bore a daughter of her own and was scratched from the budget.

That summer Mrs. Smith moved with her daughters and baby granddaughter from the country town of Tyler up to Selma, where she had found a job as a cook and waitress in a Negro cafe -- 3:30 A.M. to noon for $16 a week, later raised to $20. (The A. D. C. payments dropped in recognition of this bounty, as they did when she did some picking and hoeing in the cotton fields near Tyler.)

In their home in Selma, there is a neat sitting room in which three people can watch TV with only a little crowding; a bedroom almost completely filled by two beds; a rudimentary kitchen, and a tiny space which Mrs. Smith hopes some day to turn into a bathroom. For the present the family is served by a backyard privy.

Rent is $20 a month. The monthly gas bill comes to around $15 in the winter. Among the other regular expenses are $5 a month for sickness and accident insurance, $2 for fire insurance and 60 cents for a burial society. Mrs. Smith has no savings, and after her court case began she found it hard to get credit. "It's that suit you brought against the welfare people," a salesman told her.

NEIGHBOR TELLS CASEWORKER THAT MRS. SMITH IS VISITED WEEKENDS BY A MAN

One result of the move to Selma in 1966 was that the Smiths were assigned to a new caseworker, a matronly young woman named Mrs. Jacquelyn Stancil whose record bears out the impression she gives of going about her duties in an orderly way. After reviewing the Smith dossier and noting mention therein of one William E. Williams, Mrs. Stancil questioned a third party and was told that Mrs. Smith was receiving weekend visits from Williams, who still lived in Tyler, 15 miles south of Selma. "When I asked who told," recalls Mrs. Smith, "she said, 'It was a little bird.' I'd like to meet that little bird."

Mrs. Smith's caseworker during her years in the country had evidently been content to overlook the visits of Willie Williams; Mrs. Stancil was more fastidious. In September, 1966, Mrs. Stancil notified Mrs. Smith that her aid would be stopped if Williams kept coming around -- that, after all, was the rule.

Not one to suffer rebuffs gladly (a few weeks earlier she had addressed to President Johnson a letter complaining about her daughter's being dropped from the aid rolls because she had a baby). Mrs. Smith got into what Mrs.

Stancil describes as "a very excited state" when her own aid was stopped. She pointed out that Williams was married, his wife worked, they had nine children to take care of and, whatever his impulses, he had never been in a position to help her with more than $4 or $5 a month. "Ain't much he can do," she told Mrs. Stancil. "You can't make a man take care of his own kids, much less take care of other people's kids."

MRS. SMITH INSISTS THAT SHE HAS CERTAIN RIGHTS AND HER KIDS SHOULDN'T SUFFER

Her old caseworker and the county's A. D. C. supervisor were called in, and for two hours the three women attempted to mollify their client. Though she is able to laugh at the commotion now -- "It was a big mess" -- and is quick to concede that her caseworkers have as a rule been "nice" to her, Mrs. Smith remained unmollified about Mrs. Stancil: "She didn't have no right to cut my kids off. Sitting down there in that air-conditioned place and saying my kids can't get aid. She never came round to my house and found anybody there. I told her: 'As long as I'm not having no more kids for you to support, why should you bother me? You shouldn't be so hard on me.'" When Mrs. Stancil suggested that she end the "relationship," Mrs. Smith flatly refused; she was still young and "if I end with him, I'm gonna make a relationship with somebody." She told Mrs. Stancil: "If God had intended for me to be a nun I'd be a nun."

Efforts by Southern states to cleanse their welfare rolls of unwholesome children--a project that owes something to the "worthy poor" philosophy of another era--did not begin with the Smith family. For some years, the main tool in this work was a "suitable home" requirement, under which evidence of a parent's "casual relationships either in or outside the home" would weigh against a recipient child. Any child so vicious as to have a mother who gave birth to an illegitimate sibling would be dropped from the welfare rolls until his mother proved to the satisfaction of her county welfare department that she was going straight.

"SUITABLE HOME" RULE VIOLATES BOTH COMMON SENSE AND HUMANITY

Cleansing expeditions of this sort, carried out exlusively against people who had nothing of their own, were hampered by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which pointed out that "suitable home" rules violated both common sense and humanity. Former H. E. W. Secretary Arthur Flemming set forth the Department's position in a 1961 policy ruling against a Louisiana statute: "Whenever there is a question of the suitability of the home for the child's upbringing, steps should be taken to correct the situation, or, in the alternative, to arrange for other appropriate care of the child. It is completely inconsistent, however, to declare a home unsuitable for a child to receive assistance and at the same time permit him to remain in the same environment."

Moreover, it is not at all certain that a man around the house makes the place unsuitable. In a study carried out at about the time Alabama's substitute-father regulation was being developed, the state's welfare workers found that, far from being an invidious influence, the man often developed a warm relationship with the children; he gave them a sense of security and eased the stress on the mother.

SOME STATES LESS INTERESTED IN SAVING MINORS THAN IN CUTTING NEGROES OFF WELFARE

The suspicion among Federal officials responsible for overseeing the A. D. C. program was that some states were less interested in saving minors from corrupting surroundings than in simply ridding welfare rolls of Negroes. A. D. C. is the only one of Alabama's major assistance programs that has more Negroes in it than whites. A few years ago a study showed that 31,057 of the legitimate children receiving aid were black and 21,623 were white; in the illegitimate category, there were 16 black children for every white one. To an Alabama welfare official intent upon lopping off a lot of black bodies in a hurry, A. D. C. was the most promising field and irregular family arrangements afforded the most inviting route.

Soon after taking office as commissioner of Alabama's Department of Pensions and Security in January, 1963, Ruben K. King set to work on the A. D. C. problem. "I wanted to get down to the real meat of the coconut," says the commisioner, a short and remarkably round gentleman who received his post from former Govenor George Wallace in appreciation of his having attended law school with the Govenor's brother; he is altogether innocent of training in social work. The coconut was cracked in June, 1964, when Alabama put its substitute-father regulation into effect. Under the rule, an able-bodied male was considered a substitute father of all the children in a given household if he lived in the home with the children's mother "for the purpose of cohabitation"; if he didn't live in the house "regularly" but visited "frequently for the purpose of cohabiting" with the mother, or if he met the mother elsewhere for that purpose. The existence of a child under the age of 6 months was the prima facie evidence of the existence of a substitute father, and hence cause for stopping aid.

In reply to the suggestion that this was Alabama's way of discouraging immoral behavior, Commissioner King said, "We are not in the business to judge people morally" -- but he also said that any mother whose aid was stopped could always choose "to give up her pleasure or to act like a woman ought to act like and continue to receive aid."

It was evident that, to those who had put together this provision, "cohabit" was a synonym for "fornicate"; what "regularly" and "frequently" were synonyms for remains anybody's guess.

IN 2 YEAR PERIOD 15,000 CHILDREN WERE REMOVED FROM ALABAMA WELFARE ROLLS

The regulation worked. Between 1964 and 1966 some 15,000 children were removed from the relief rolls of Alabama, and applications for aid on behalf of 6,400 children were rejected. What color children? In 30 months in seven representative counties, 498 cases were closed; 97 per cent of the children were black. Commisioner King expresses regret that the provision seems to have been applied with particular stringency in areas with the heaviest concentrations of Negroes.

Alabama authorities contend that Mrs. Smith's case was not typical. In most of the families covered by the substitute-father rule, they say, the man involved was in fact the father of the recipient children and was keeping up a connection with the family. Nevertheless, had Mrs. Smith wished to become eligible again after being barred from aid, her course was to inform the state that she had broken with the phantom father and to have this news corroborated by at least two "acceptable references in a position to know." Singled out as persons in a position to know were "law-enforcement officials, ministers, neighbors, grocers." With Mrs. Smith's permission an investigator would have gone to her favorite policeman or grocer to inquire whether she was still enjoying sexual relations with Williams and, if so, where and how often. Mrs. Smith did not grant her caseworker such permission -- "I told her it was none of her business."

At no time during her run-in with the Department of Pensions and Security did Mrs. Smith show any of the hangdog apathy once associated with welfare recipients. She skips rather than walks and fairly bounces with energy, her enthusiasm leaping from her granddaughter to the indoor bathroom she is hoping to install to the used car she would like to buy. Her temper is by no means chronically militant, and laughter at her own predicament has a way of breaking through her indignation -- but indignant she surely was at the idea that the welfare people could punish her family, which she had kept together for years by main determination and hard work, because they didn't like her private doings.

LAWYER SAYS MRS. SMITH'S CASE SHOWS RACIAL DISCRIMINATION IN WELFARE POLICY

In the fall of 1966, she took her story to some civil-rights workers who had won a reputation around Selma for talking tough to welfare-department functionaries. From Selma the details were relayed to New York, to the Center on Social Welfare Policy, which had recently been set up at Columbia University and was soliciting cases in behalf of welfare clients.

An associate at the Columbia Center went to Selma to talk with Mrs. Smith and check the facts. This was but one of many cases the Center's attorneys were looking into at the time, and they decided to go ahead with it. "The facts were perfect," Garbus says. "If Alabama had any sense, they would have restored Mrs. Smith's aid and tried to wash out the action. The so-called substitute father was not in fact the father of any of the children; he was not living in their home or performing any of a father's duties; he was under no obligation to contribute to their support, and in fact he was not contributing."

Although the attorneys suspected that racial discrimination existed in the welfare policies of numerous states, it was easiest to demonstrate in Alabama. They were also attracted to the Smith case by the fact that the Department of Health, Education and Welfare had never approved the Alabama regulation. (Not that it had effectively disapproved it. Part of H. E. W.'s ineffectiveness stemmed from its unwieldy power. It could cut off aid altogether if a state program was unacceptable, but barring such massive retaliation, destructive of everybody's interests, its powers were pretty much limited to polite reprimands and requests to the states for a policy in keeping with Federal intent. Even After the Smith case was under way and the court urged it to come forward, H. E. W. played a curiously coy part. The reasons, one may fairly surmise, have to do with politics. In the best of times H. E. W. is not a favored child of the Congress, and these are not the best of times for domestic welfare -- or for upsetting Southern legislators. No one took exception to Commissioner King's contention that H. E. W. suffers from a want of "guts.")

COURT FINDS SUBSTITUTE-FATHER RULE ARBITRARY AND DISCRIMINATORY

Attorney Garbus filed an action in Mrs. Smith's behalf in Federal District Court in Montgomery November 23, 1966. The inducements to go into Federal court rather than attempt to get redress for a Negro in the state courts of of the South require no special elucidation.

At this point we may bid good-by to Mrs. Smith, for her case is in truth no longer hers. It has become a "class action," brought in behalf of "all other persons similarly situated," the tens of thousands of mothers and hundreds of thousands of children who were being deprived of aid by the substitute-father rules of 19 states and the District of Columbia. Mrs. Smith had provided the legal wedge. With the doors of the courtroom now open, she was transformed into Mrs. Sylvester Smith, et al., plaintiffs.

In November, 1967, just a year after the original complaint, United States Circuit Judge John C. Godbold and District Judges Virgil Pittman and Frank Johnson delivered their decision. They called the substitute-father rule "arbitrary and discriminatory" and declared that it violated the equal-protection clause of the 14th Amendment by permitting Alabama to "pick and choose the mothers and children it will aid through the use of some classifications which are not rationally related to the purpose of the applicable statutes."

The State of Alabama appealed the decision and the case went to the U. S. Supreme Court. The Supreme Court upheld the decision. To the justices, handing down their decision as the poor people were gathering in Resurrection City, it seemed "inconceivable" that Alabama was free to discourage immorality by disqualifying needy children from aid. The Social Security Act stated that aid was to be granted to all eligible children, and so, they ruled, it must be. Chief Justice Warren, in the name of a unanimous Court, wrote: "We hold today only that Congress has made at least this one determination: that destitute children who are legally fatherless cannot be flatly denied federally funded assistance on the transparent fiction that they have a substitute father."

GREAT ISSUE INVOLVED IS WHETHER POOR PEOPLE HAVE REDUCED RIGHTS UNDER THE LAW

The great issue at the center of the Smith case and the cases that will follow is whether individuals are diminished in the eyes of the law because they are poor and need help. Garbus sees his victory as the beginning of a full-scale attack on a whole array of state welfare practices. In its next session, the Supreme Court is scheduled to hear a challenge to the one-year residency requirement for welfare applicants in a number of states, and other challenges are in the making; they could in time affect eight million people.

MRS. SMITH MEETS HER ATTORNEY

Between October, 1966 -- when she learned that her money was being cut off -- and June, 1968 -- when the Supreme Court delivered its decision -- Mrs. Smith never met her attorney champion, Martin Garbus. But a few weeks ago, on the muddy road outside the Smith home, where the town of Selma gives way to open fields, they finally did meet. There was joy on both sides, and the conversation was lively. She told him about the people she knew who had been put back on welfare because of her case; he promised to send her pictures of her family that had appeared in the newspapers. But their happiness was tempered by the news that a few weeks earlier Mrs. Smith, through no fault of her own, had been laid off from a factory job which paid $1.60 an hour. Another job will probably come along for Mrs. Smith; her newest caseworker, impressed by her intelligence and energy, has no doubt of that. But for now the victorious plaintiff was waiting for her latest A. D. C. application to be acted on, and in the meantime she was having difficulty getting together $3 to buy food stamps.

Sharing Prosperity— Income Policy Choices

by Elizabeth Wickenden

The role of work in the modern society is central to any income policy discussion. Popular attitudes place the highest value on work not only as the basis for income, but also for self and community esteem. Most of the current self-help efforts of the poverty program are directed toward fitting the poor to work and creating new job opportunities for that purpose. Yet some writers maintain that cybernation is already making obsolescent this traditional nexus between work and income. They look to the day when every individual or family would be paid a stipend as consumer, somewhat in the tradition of the Townsend old age pension plan. To my mind, this makes much better sense than the complexities of a largescale, all-purpose program based on income deficiency.

But this dream of lying under the cybernetic breadfruit tree has its setting in an unpredictable future. At the present time, it is consistent neither with technological realities nor most people's wishes. It seems an absurdity to talk about work as obsolescent when we have not enough houses, schools, hospitals, cultural centers, parks and playgrounds; when we lack teachers, nurses, librarians, social workers, youth leaders, day care for children, social centers for the aged, homemakers for the ill and handicapped, doctors, lawyers, merchants, chiefs; when our streams and our air are polluted, our parks neglected, our highways and airways corrupted by commercialism and our choices for enriching our spare time similarly constricted. And all this leaves out the desperate needs of the rest of the world for our food, our machinery, our scientific know-how, our support for the instruments of cooperation.

I do not think everyone should have to work or work so long and so hard as many do at present. Considering that we are all born dependent, die dependent and spend varying periods of our life dependent, our fear and rejection of "dependency" is somewhat absurd. But for the moment work still offers for most people the most satisfying sense of identity and achievement, the most acceptable source of current and deferred income. Most people are quite willing and conditioned by habit to spending their money for benefits derived from the work of others. But they need to place as high a valuation on direct services as they do the products of labor and as high a valuation on services financed by taxes as on those purchased in the marketplace. For the more mechanical become our processes for producing things, the more we can free our energies for the fundamental human task of mutual service. And as Kenneth Galbraith points out in "The Affuent Society," a large proportion of these services lie in the public sector.

A Guaranteed Job

I feel that the government should guarantee a job at standard wages to everyone willing and able to work, should pioneer in the development of new kinds of work for persons of all ages and backgrounds, should subsidize retraining and relocation for all those displaced by economic change, should facilitate work for those with family responsibilities through social services such as day care and visiting nurse service, should treat education at the higher levels as compensable work, should place a value on work in the home (the Chase Manhattan Bank recently evaluated the average housewife's labor at over $8,000 a year), and should extend expanded social insurance protections to all these categories.

The idea of a guaranteed job, implicit in the Employment Act of 1946 though never implemented, seems revolutionary to many laissez-faire advocates who see in the labor reserve a necessary goad to industry and effort. But in 1906, Beatrice Webb noted in her diary a speech by Winston Churchill advocating a minimal guarantee of income with the state as a "reserve employer of labor." It is evidently not ideas and proposals that are lacking, nor even in our time the means—but rather the will to implement them.

Work-Related Insurance

Work is not only the most generally accepted basis for money transfers in the form of wage or purchase payments, but also seems in our present state of social development to offer the most generally acceptable basis for deferred payments when earnings are interrupted by such general hazards as old age, retirement, disability and premature death and transitional unemployment. Insurance systems in other countries cover additional risks such as health costs, wage losses due to sickness and maternity and the economic costs of child-rearing. The rapid growth in coverage, the addition of new benefits and a high degree of popular acceptability for our own federal Old Age, Survivors, Disability and Health Insurance program result—in my opinion—from three interrelated factors: its work-related basis for entitlement, the sense of identification between worker as contributor and worker as beneficiary and the fact of self-contained financing outside the annual appropriating process. The modifications which have either taken place or been proposed in each of these principles deserve the most careful evaluation if the system is to be preserved and strengthened.

Social insurance has come under intensive review and some criticism in the current reappraisal. Many of the criticisms are inconsistent. Some complain that the system is not sufficiently redistributive while others complain that people do not take out precisely what they put in. (They seem to visualize a little bag of gold in Fort Knox with their name on it, more like a savings account than an insurance policy.) Some complain that the payroll tax on workers is regressive while that on employers inhibits employment by raising costs. Others make the sophistical error of combining public assistance and social insurance payments and then criticizing the payments going to the non-needy as if all were intended for that purpose. Some favor universal pension-type coverage of the aged (currently incorporated on a transitional basis in medicare and the so-called Prouty amendment minimal payments to those without social insurance credits under governmental program) and some favor optional coverage for the individual.

But most people accept social insurance as a deferred return on labor, a "right" cemented by their own contributions unrelated to their current need. Its role in relationship to poverty is preventive, not alleviative, and any move toward an income-related entitlement would destroy its essential value.

Its principal limitation as a poverty preventive at the present time is the inadequate level of its benefits which have not kept pace with the rise in earnings levels. Many advocates feel that benefit levels should be at least doubled with a general revenue sharing in the cost of this increase. It is their belief that general revenue could help to carry the social costs of the system (initiating costs, weighted benefits for low earners and dependents' allowances) as in other countries without endangering the principle of earned entitlement.

Tax-Supported Services

It is the thrust of this discussion that the need for income deficiency benefits should be reduced to a minimum by methods and programs more consistent with American values, attitudes and willingness to pay. But money payments related to work are only one such method. Another is the provision of tax-supported services and benefits to the public generally or specified groups in the population. Education, health benefits, subsidized housing, child care services, recreational and cultural provisions all provide real income, replace private expenditures for the same purposes and help to prevent at least some of the causes and by-products of poverty. Again the question arises as to whether it is better policy to concentrate resources available for this purpose on the needs of those who are least able to purchase them (the poor) or whether a more democratic, less divisive and hence more acceptable pattern lies in universality. The former assumes limited resources and compensatory concentration for a transitional period but runs the risk of ultimate segregation by income class and the danger of second-rate services for the poor.

A second question involves the relationship of disposable personal income to tax-supported services. American tradition has tended to an over-evaluation of the former at the expense of the latter but there is also a danger in further distinguishing the poor from the affluent by restrictive benefits. The current recipient revolt against the limitations of the stamp plan for subsidized food purchases reflects the high valuation which people place on the freedom, convertibility and anonymity of cash income. Without an adequate income policy it is virtually impossible to evaluate the intrinsic utility of such compensatory measures.

Public services also constitute the arena for a peculiarly interesting crosscurrent in American attitudes today. This is the pressure for individuals grouped together as consumers of public services—whether around geographical neighborhoods or particular institutions such as schools, housing projects, social service centers, etc.—to control or influence the character of these services. Again, the poverty program through its emphasis on "maximum feasible participation of the poor" in community action undertakings has been a major catalytic agent in accelerating this decentralizing process.

It is interesting to observe that while pressures for income payments have been largely directed toward more centralization (on the assumption that higher standards and more objective entitlement would lie in nationwide control), the reaction to centralized bureaucracy has largely centered on neighborhood social services—not excluding the services of lawyers to strengthen the hand of consumers vis-à-vis the political and economic bureaucracies. While the poverty program has tended to focus this effort on the poor, the true common denominator is the consumer. Thus we need to cultivate new forms of consumer-dominated cooperation in providing wanted social services as an offset to the limitations of governmental monopoly.

Another frequently discussed alternative to income deficiency payments involves benefits related to age or condition without regard to prior work history or individual need. Family allowances, old age pensions and disability pensions fall in this category. It is my belief that these are all historical anachronisms that would do little to enlist the support so necessary to a more effective income policy. Family limitation through contraceptive aids is now replacing subsidized family expansion as a primary goal of social policy.

Moreover, countries like the United Kingdom and France with longstanding family allowance plans are finding it difficult to channel more money to the most desperately needy families in the face of pressures to raise the universal benefits. Old age pensions would tend to settle at the lowest level of the present retirement benefit scale unless supplemented by payments related to earnings or need, in which case they would lose their basic simplicity. Rehabilitation and facilitated employment have replaced subsidized idleness as the remedy of choice for the disabled. Thus these options of yesteryear seem to me to offer little practical hope for future development.

Income Deficiency Payments

So finally I return once again to income deficiency benefits, residuary legatee of the nation's income policy. It seems obvious that no system based on work-related benefits and universal public services can meet all needs. Some people, either because of physical or emotional disabilities, are never connected with the workforce. Universally available health, mental health, rehabilitative, training and specialized institutional services might meet the need for many of these and each of these services might well carry its own provisions for cash income needs (as, for example, is now the case with the MDTA program). Some risks, most notably that of children deprived of parental support because of desertion before or after birth do not seem to lend themselves to the risk-sharing concept of social insurance. Essentially this is a child welfare problem and is discussed in that context. But more persuasively, some needs are so great, so temporary or so unusual that they require an individualized approach.

Most of the present differences of viewpoint that surround an appropriate method for providing ultimate underpinning protection against these needs seem to be either related to emphasis or administrative method.

On the first score, there are those who feel our primary emphasis in income policy should center on minimal guarantees with some going so far as to see these as replacing all those measures, like social insurance, directed to the prevention of poverty before it occurs. To my mind this is both defeatist in the sense that it presupposes the impossibility or undesirability of preventing poverty (it is a simple fact of logic that one cannot prevent poverty by measures conditioned on its prior existence) and dangerous in subjecting the impoverished minority to all the isolating, denigrating pressures previously discussed. But a national income policy that sets its sights on the prevention of poverty and alienation does not reduce the obligation to provide protective, alleviative and restorative measures on a basis of decency and dignity when they occur. It is simply that we cannot afford to risk the destruction or weakening of preventive measures by an ill-conceived emphasis on alleviative measures which carry such a seductive allure of economy to the rest of society.

Administrative Questions

On the administrative side, I see three interrelated questions: (1) Should a program of minimal income guarantees be federally-administered or should it be continued under some modification of the existing federal-state pattern? (2) Should it be administered by a tax-controlling agency as a reverse aspect of the redistributive function of taxation? and (3) Should the granting of cash income be totally divorced from the giving of individualized social service?

Advisory Council Recommendations

As a member of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare appointed under the authority of the 1962 Public Welfare Amendments, my own views are largely reflected in the recommendations of that Council. It is the general thesis of its report that a radically different pattern of federal financing could assure a federally-determined nationwide minimum standard under state administration and that this standard should incorporate both income guarantees for all needy and essential social services for all who want and need them. The term Basic Social Guarantee is applied to this combined approach.

The Council's recommendations are predicated on the assumption that a primary goal is the reduction of the incidence of income deficiency by all the measures herein described or any others yet to be devised. It is on this assumption that it sees the task of providing residual minimal income guarantees as being closely related to the provision of a vastly expanded range of social services. The family head suddenly confronted with catastrophic needs, the deserted mother of several young children, the elderly couple stricken by illness or failure of competence on the part of one partner, the victim of fire or other emergency (to name just a few examples) cannot afford the time or energy to run from one agency to another. He needs a single source of help, hopefully available in his own neighborhood. He doesn't need an internal revenue agent or an income based on his past year's deficiency but immediate help which is both personal and monetary.

Much of the opposition to this viewpoint stems from judgments directed against the existing public welfare machinery and its social worker agents. The public welfare agency as the residuary legatee of all society's failures on other fronts is the built-in scapegoat. Taxpayers berate it for excessive leniency and its clients for excessive harshness. But like any other governmental agency, it is the instrument of public laws and attitudes. To the extent that these are harsh, restrictive and inadequate, so, too, is their agent, the public welfare department. Any other agency required under these circumstances to spread too little money over too great a range of legally-entitled need would soon suffer from the same characteristics. The remedy lies in changing the attitudes of the general public.

Present public welfare laws, reflecting anachronistic public attitudes are clearly outdated. They still reflect the impoverished economy of the thirties, when reducing unemployment was the primary social goal and decentralized responsibility the dominating social heritage. By undertaking to guarantee employment for the employables (the rhetoric of 1935 spoke of guarantees though the appropriations were never adequate for the purpose and wartime labor shortages shortly made them unnecessary), three categories of need were singled out for federally-aided assistance. Support for these three categories—old age, blindness, and mothers responsible for small children—was thought to be a socially desirable method of relieving pressure on the labor market. It was assumed that the states should not only set the level of entitlement and support for these categories, but should be able to carry unaided the burden of general assistance for those needy not included in any federal measure. Small stimulative grants for child welfare services in rural areas and those of special need were also provided.

Over the years, the scope of federally-aided assistance has been broadened, though still within the concept of categorical limitations, and the level of federal financial participation has been raised, though still within a reimbursement formula that leaves the standard of assistance to state determination and favors those with low standards. In no sense can it be said that a national assistance policy has been achieved, since each state is free to determine the extent of its own responsibility both as to whom should be aided and at what level. Few states extend assistance to all needy; virtually all—to a greater or lesser extent—deny assistance to newcomers within the state, and the levels of assistance for the most part are far below any conceivable standard of health and decency. Yet many of those whose standards are the lowest (Mississippi, for example, with average per capita monthly allowances for children below $9.00) tax themselves more heavily than the average for this purpose.

Need for National Policy

Obviously, any nationwide remedy for this situation requires federal action which is comprehensive with respect to coverage, standards and financing. Those who argue for outright federalization can make a strong case that a nationwide program incorporating federal standards requires federal financing and cannot be left to the veto power of optional state implementation. The same argument can, however, be made with respect to many other responsibilities traditionally reserved to the states and so far centralizing moves have required oblique rather than direct action for political approval. (Even the unemployment insurance system, clearly a factor in interstate commerce, has been held to state-determined standards by a strongly states' rights resistance to change.)

The Advisory Council on Public Welfare chose the carrot approach to federal standards by proposing a transitionally optional system of financing whereby the federal government would meet in its entirety (above a stipulated fair share annual lump sum expenditure by the state, based on fiscal effort in relationship to its average per capita income) the cost of implementing federal standards. This concept of federal aid, originally the brainchild of the late Senator Robert Taft, places clearly on the federal government the financing of those extra costs resulting from its own standard setting.

It was the thought of the Advisory Council that this financing pattern might prove sufficiently attractive to the states to offset the political resistance which has so far met every effort at national advance. Its principal weakness is, of course, the possibility of state unwillingness to implement the program at any price. Most members of the Council thought this an unlikely contingency in view of its heavy economic price (no state has, for example, declined its costly option to forgo unemployment insurance) while others favored the ultimate sanction of federal administration in the case of state recalcitrance, as existed in the days of federal relief program.

The Council also favored the close association of minimum service standards with minimum income standards, applying the phrase Basic Social Guarantee to this combined approach. This recommendation runs counter to much of the current social orthodoxy which assumes that services are intrinsically a means of curtailing money payments. Again, all depends on popular attitudes and circumstances. The family bent on finding a child for adoption or decent nursing care for an aged relative does not look on social services in this light. The Council's assumption of adequate income from other sources for people capable of working and adequate replacement income for those with a family work history reduces the residual problem of income insufficiency to those with special social problems.

The real problem on both counts comes back to the central ideological confrontation of our times: the puritanical value system of the majority and the ghetto heritage of our principal minority groups. It is most sharply focused in the problem of support for abandoned children and alienated youth: the beneficiaries of our embattled program of Aid for Families Dependent Children. Not all children in this program are Negro, but the judgmental attitudes directed toward Negro alienation from social opportunities and social norms has contributed to the low standards in this program. But in all discussions, from the Moynihan report on the Negro family to the evaluations of the Comptroller General, the central issue seems to have been obscured: that protection of the welfare of children is one of the most ancient of social obligations.

In fact, an anthropologist, Earl Counts, in identifying that which differentiated man from the apes has this to say: "The pre-human juvenile became a human child when the hitherto private business that he is an appurtenance of a certain female becomes everybody's business."

By this standard our claim to humanity seems rather shaky in a day when the weight of public opinion and political action seems bent on forcing needy mothers off the assistance rolls regardless of the impact on their children of such deprivation and indignity. Instead of using the starvation of a child as means of punishing its mother, we need to look upon child welfare protections as involving support as well as social services.

We are now in the rather absurd situation of being willing to pay reasonable fees to a foster mother for the care of a child removed from its home while we deny comparable support to the same child in its own home.

The concept of child welfare services needs to be broadened to carry a built-in provision of income as essential to that protective service. Only in this way can we extend the reality of a protective society to all children without regard to race, income or our judgments regarding the past actions of their parents. No challenge to our democratic pretensions outweighs the need to assure protective provisions for children, primary charge on the social conscience of mankind.

Guaranteed Income

The Well-to-Do Do Better on Welfare Too

By A. DALE TUSSING

IT is well known that there is an enormous amount of discussion these days of new, general and comprehensive programs for income maintenance and security—family allowances, guaranteed incomes, negative income taxes, and the like.

What is perhaps less well known is that there exists already a vast and complex system of income security, protection, and maintenance, partly public and partly private, partly explicit but largely concealed, which provides largely for the non-poor, and which dwarfs, both in aggregate and on a per-person basis, existing programs for the poor.

I refer to such programs as unemployment compensation, workmen's compensation, the right to collective bargaining, parity price-support programs, the manifold welfare for-the-rich programs which are hidden in our tax laws, and many, many others. None of these programs is universal in scope; and the poor are always the most substantial group excluded. It is fair to say that we have already succeeded in a kind of war on poverty by erecting a floor to the incomes and well-being of those already in the middle class, such that only the most determined non-poor person could succeed in becoming poor and passing his poverty on to his heirs; but by excluding the poor from most of these programs we have also made this floor a ceiling, making it extremely difficult for the poor to enter the affluence of the middle class.

It is reasonable to inquire how we came to have the complex and confusing labyrinth of special-purpose welfare programs which exist in America today. The general answer is that it is a product of our philosophy of individualism, which has led us to to reject out of hand any comprehensive and uniform income-security program such as the Riot Commission recommends, because such programs violate the maxim that people should prosper only as they are productive, and that receipt of money or goods at public expense is immoral. Our philosophy of individualism has not led us in the middle class to reject welfare programs when we need them; it has instead led us to construct them in a manner which is tailor-made to deal with narrow clienteles and narrow ranges of problems, and in such a way as to conceal their true nature. Indeed, one of the surest ways to tell whether an American is poor is to inquire as to what his income support is called: if it is called "insurance," "parity," "tax relief," and the like, he is unlikely to be poor, but if it is called "welfare," then the recipient is clearly politically and economically underprivileged.

Dignity for Wealthy, Shame for the Poor

Our dual welfare system, hidden and dignified for most, exposed and humiliating for the poor, has had a number of serious consequences. It permits us in the middle class to feel self-righteous about poor people's welfare, and to expect not only gratitude but in most instances surrender of the recipient's control over his own life. That is, it fosters in the poor, but not in the non-poor, an attitude of dependency—an attitude which is of course misplaced in a society in which the lion's share of welfare payments goes to the non-poor, but an attitude which nonetheless is among the most important barriers to solving the problems of poverty.

Secondly, the hidden welfare system for the middle class often provides in a manner precisely opposite to need. The best-known example is the price-support program for farm products, which assists most the largest and most productive farms. But far more important are the techniques concealed in our tax laws. The income tax law permits, for instance, deduction of mortgage-loan interest expense, thus providing a technique for what is in effect a massive rent-supplement program for the middle and upper classes. The cost of this provision, in tax dollars lost, exceeds by a considerable amount the combined costs each year of all federal housing programs for the poor. Moreover, the larger one's income, presumably the larger one's home and mortgage, and the more, not less, assistance is provided by this deduction.

Thirdly, virtually all of the hidden welfare programs for the non-poor are immune to "economy drives," such as we are now experiencing at all levels of government. Thus the Congress slashes Poverty War and urban programs, freezes the percentage of children in each state who can be assisted under Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and the state legislature emasculates the Medicaid program; but there is no discussion at all of cutting back on the welfare programs for the non-poor. Indeed, they continue to grow.

Four Ways to Correct System

The dual welfare system is unjust and must be corrected. There seem to be four possible alternatives:

1. We might extend the existing programs for the non-poor so that they also cover the poor. In some cases this is possible. We can, for instance, extend compulsory collective bargaining to cover farm workers, hospital workers, and others who have been exempted. We can revise the unemployment compensation program so that all workers are covered, and so that employers in some fields are not permitted to use the public assistance system as their own costless unemployment compensation program. But generally, the very nature of existing programs makes it impossible to extend them to the poor.

2. We could attempt to design many new special-purpose welfare programs for the poor, to give them parity with the non-poor. In principle, there is nothing wrong with this strategy; but it will readily be perceived that this is precisely the strategy we have been following, and it has not succeeded.

3. We could, following the advice of Professor Milton Friedman, abolish the entire dual system of welfare—social security, farm price supports, public housing, surplus-food distribution, unemployment compensation, everything—and substitute a uniform and comprehensive income-maintenance system such as Friedman's negative income tax. This is the approach that most economists, left and right in political persuasion, favor. Certainly Friedman's logic is impeccable: we support someone because he needs support, not because he is a homeowner, a farmer, or an aged person; and we maintain the maximum of freedom when we provide them with money supplements as a matter of right to spend as they will, rather than goods or restricted payments at the whim of a bureaucracy.

4. Finally, we can set up an income-maintenance program, as the Riot Commission suggests, which establishes a floor income as a matter of right, and which is, in effect, the income-maintenance program of last resort. That is, it would take into account, to the extent possible, assistance received in other forms. Such a program would make an even floor out of our presently uneven one, by automatically filling in the gaps for those persons for whom there are no tailor-made programs.

A program of income-maintenance sufficiently general and automatic so as to end the dependency-creating effects of the present welfare system, and with sufficiently high benefits as to break the vicious circles of poverty, would be quite costly. But as an economist I must tell you that the costs are well within the reach of the United States. For instance, if in 1964 we had not reduced incomes taxes but had instead applied the same amount to income maintenance, we could have raised every poor family above the poverty line. The costs today would be but a fraction of the costs of Vietnam. Americans do not reject income-maintenance because of cost, but because of a misplaced moralism that leads them to oppose welfare payments on principle and to receive billions in hidden welfare payments themselves. They reject income maintenance programs out of a usually unconscious belief that the poor should be poor, an inevitable by-product of a psychologically necessary belief that they themselves are affluent because they deserve to be.

Guaranteed Annual Income Gains Support

The idea of guaranteeing every American a minimum annual income through a "negative income tax" is gaining more and more support across the nation. Which doesn't mean that everyone's in favor of it.

Probably if a poll were taken among the public today, the majority of Americans would reject the idea as another "handout" for the poor and another means of paying people for not working.

But the signs are there that point to a change in the nation's thinking in future years. They are the same signs which preceded the Social Security Act, unemployment insurance, the minimum wage and Medicare. Although all are fully accepted today by most people, they were considered by many as positive steps along the road to socialism hardly more than 30 years ago.

The principal reason for such a "radical" idea as a guaranteed annual wage is dissatisfaction with today's system of public welfare. According to noted columnist Sylvia Porter, those in favor of changes in our welfare programs include such varied Americans as conservative businessmen, radical economists, militant Negros, reactionary politicians, liberal Democrats and stand-pat Republicans.

It started out as a major issue in the political campaigns earlier in the year. Although it has been shoved aside in recent months by the more emotional issues of "law and order" and the Vietnam war, it hasn't been forgotten by those who favor changing the welfare system.

According to Mrs. Porter, the riots of summer 1967 added new urgency to the problem of poverty. It is finally being admitted that poverty is a burden on our whole society, not just the poor. It also is clear that poverty breeds disease, delinquency, crime and immorality.

She also points out that our welfare system has not only failed to solve our poverty problem, but it has actually made the problem worse in many ways. Even after years of the greatest prosperity the nation has ever known, welfare costs are at the highest ever and rising steadily.

The urban crisis also has a direct relationship to the problem of welfare. President Johnson's riot commission favors a national system for boosting incomes, saying that dependence on welfare must be broken by giving children of the poor a chance to join the rest of society. The return on the investment would be great, the commission stated.

Another shortcoming of the present welfare system is the lack of uniform assistance among the states. Relief benefits for a family of four range from a low of $40 a month in Mississippi to $280 a month in New Jersey.

And most states withhold welfare to families where there is a "man in the house" which has resulted in the abandonment of countless families by the men so the children can get assistance.

What's wrong with today's welfare system? Mrs. Porter answers with the statement that it doesn't work. It covers only about eight million of the 30 million Americans now living below the $3,300 poverty level set by the federal government for a family of four.

"Settle a bet for us, will you, Luther? Did you do something right last Tuesday around 1:00 o'clock?"

It costs $8 billion a year to do only this, $840 million of which goes for administrative costs.

It is degrading and humiliating, she says, and it undermines human dignity and importance. And its conflicting rules discourage people who want to work from doing so.

Those 30 million Americans living below the poverty line represent 15 percent of our population and one out of every four of the nation's children. More than half are under 18. About 80 percent of the kids on welfare live in homes without fathers including one of every ten white children and six of every ten non-white children.

One-third of those on welfare are the aged, the blind and the disabled, and some study groups have recommended that those persons be transferred to Social Security.

Many leading Americans have given opinions on the welfare system and possible solutions to the problem. Vice President Humphrey says the present welfare program "mocks justice." Richard Nixon, the Republican presidential candidate, said he is studying a wide range of alternatives to the present welfare system, including a guaranteed income.

The AFL-CIO has come out in favor of a system of minimum incomes, and economists ranging from the conservative Dr. Milton Friedman, Barry Goldwater's advisor, to the liberal Dr. James Tobin of Yale University have endorsed the negative income tax.

The negative income tax has attracted the most attention and probably has more support than other proposals such as "children's or family allowances" which would make payments to all families with children, rich or poor.

Under the negative income tax concept, a break-even level of income would be set as the dividing line between poor and non-poor. The poverty line could possibly be $3,300 for a family of four, the standard set by the federal government.

Every tax unit, either a person living alone or a family, would then add up its total annual income and file a return. If that income amounted to less than its break-even level, the unit would receive a tax payment from the Treasury instead of paying a tax to the Treasury. In other words, it would be a negative income tax.

One feature of the plan which probably will draw the most criticism would be payment of the allowance in cash with each recipient having the freedom to spend it as he pleases.

Mrs. Porter explains that the benefits would be a matter of right. She describes "right" as the heart of the negative income tax proposal, because it removes distinctions between the person who can't work and the "loafer" who won't. Under that concept, only the family's size and income level would determine the amount of payment.

It is estimated that the poverty gap amounts to $10.8 billion... which means it would cost that much on top of the $8 billion a year now being spent on welfare to lift all 30 million of the poor out of poverty.

The negative income tax and welfare reform seem to be tied as closely together as poverty and disease, immorality and crime. Whether you believe the present welfare system is adequate or inadequate, just or unjust, you undoubtedly will be hearing more about reforms and new concepts in the months and years ahead.

Nixon's Agriculture Secretary Sees a Need for Federal Farm Programs

By FELIX BELAIR JR.

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20 — The next Secretary of Agriculture said today that some Federal programs would be necessary to keep farm production in line with domestic and foreign demand and to remedy the "income gap" for farmers.

But Clifford M. Hardin, who will head the Department of Agriculture in the Nixon Administration, refused in his first news conference to commit himself on any specific policy question. Near the end of an hour's session with newsmen he was asked to outline broadly any differences between the farm policies of the Nixon Administration and those of its predecessor.

"I do not think I know," Mr. Hardin said.

It was clear that the 53-year-old chancellor of the University of Nebraska took literally President-elect Richard M. Nixon's admonition to all members of his prospective Cabinet to avoid public discussion of policy questions until the new Administration takes over on Jan. 20.

It was equally clear that Mr. Hardin was determined to say nothing that could stir opposition in the Democratically controlled Congress, such as greeted the news conference remarks earlier in the week of the Interior Secretary-designate Walter J. Hickel, now Governor of Alaska.

Two Democratic Senators, Walter F. Mondale of Minnesota and Gale W. McGee of Wyoming, criticized Mr. Hickel today for his statements on Wednesday about conservation.

And Senator George D. Aiken, Republican of Vermont, said at Montpelier that he would fight the confirmation of Mr. Hickel for the Cabinet post if he was opposed to the foreign trade zones proposed for Portland and Machiasport, Me.

Senator Aiken said that if Mr. Hickel was correctly quoted in his news conference here as opposing an 8 per cent share of the national foreign oil import quota for the planned foreign trade zones, "it sounds like he thinks the Secretary of Interior is supposed to represent Alaska and the Western oil fields."

Senator Mondale said Mr. Hickel's philosophy "does violence to conservation principles essential to the country." He cited Mr. Hickel's announced opposition to setting aside land and natural resources "strictly in the name of conservation" and his disagreement with the fixing of national clean water standards.

Senator Mondale said national standards were needed to clean up pollution of rivers and lakes. He said that without such standards industries would migrate from states having strict controls to those having none.

Senator McGee said Mr. Hickel's statements about conservation had made many Senators "feel uneasy."

Herbert G. Klein, communications director for President-elect Nixon, said in introducing Mr. Hardin at the news conference that policy questions would be "off limits." One reason for this, he said, was that a study group was being organized to advise Mr. Hardin on details of the programs he will have to administer after Jan. 20.

Still, some policy directions shone through Mr. Hardin's replies to questions when he did not sidestep them entirely. He said, for instance, that there was little he could do to change most ongoing farm programs before 1970, when they will terminate by law unless renewed.

Has No New Plan

Regulation of production will have to be continued in some form, he said, because it is a continuing problem arising from the blessings of abundance. Part of the problem stems from the fact that the return to farmers on invested capital is lower than for other sectors of the economy, so that farmers have not shared fully in advancing technology, he added.

But whether supply management is to be sought through acreage controls with price supports and payment certificates, as at present, will have to be decided later, Mr. Hardin said. Later he indicated he had no plan to substitute for the present system.

This came when he was asked about a proposal, during the recent Congress, that payments to farmres cooperating in acreage control programs be limited to a maximum of $25,000 to any individual producer.

Mr. Hardin said that he was aware of the proposal but that it raised a question whether enough acres could be taken out of production if the limitation were incorporated in control programs. Some large wheat producers have received more than $1-million a year because of the extensive acreage they control.

Romney Vows Low-Cost Homes; Seeks New Priorities for Cities

By JOHN HERBERS

WASHINGTON, Dec. 20—The man who made the compact car popular a decade ago promised today to bring America the low-cost house.

Gov. George Romney of Michigan, a former president and chairman of American Motors, held his first Washington news conference since Richard M. Nixon chose him to be Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. He was exuberant and expansive and left the impression that he could not wait until Jan. 20 to shake up the Government.

Mr. Romney made it plain that he favored keeping the department operating on at least its current level of commitment and that he would like to see a realignment of Government priorities so that more would be done for the cities.

The Nixon people, in their transition offices two blocks from the White House, have been putting Cabinet designers before the press all week. Herbert G. Klein, the new Administration's press aide introduced Mr. Romney with the usual statement that he would not talk about "future policy, strategy or programs."

But Mr. Romney spoke with some confidence about some of the things he intended to do at the housing department, which has the reputation of containing one of the most lethargic bureaucracies in Washington.

In the automobile industry, he recalled, he had "made the compact car popular, at least for a while," and he hoped to employ "the same kind of technology and innovations to bring down the costs of building housing."

Recent studies have shown that restrictive building codes, union practices and manufacturing methods have made the cost of new decent housing so high that millions of Americans cannot afford it. As housing Secretary, Mr. Romney will be in a position to correct some of these practices in administering the Omnibus Housing Act of 1968.

Mr. Romney said he was delighted that Mr. Nixon had decided to have a Council on Urban Affairs at Cabinet level with Daniel P. Moynihan, a former Assistant Secretary of Labor in the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations, to head it. He said he envisioned Mr. Moynihan as the "idea man," with the Cabinet members and the President deciding which programs to push.

Too Soon to Comment

Reminded that Mr. Moynihan has for some time been a strong advocate of a family allowance from the Government, Mr. Romney was asked if he, too, favored such a plan. Mr. Romney said it was too early to get into that.

"I have the impression Mr. Moynihan will be looking at some of the things he has written and said," Mr. Romney said.

Mr. Romney was also asked about the use of tax credits to engage private enterprise in rebuilding the slums, a concept advocated by Mr. Nixon in his campaign but opposed by key members of Congress.

"That is a tool we ought to take a good, hard look at," Mr. Romney said. "On a selective basis it could be good, but only as one of many tools."

Mr. Nixon has given Governor Romney the additional assignment of organizing volunteer work across the country to help rebuild the cities. Mr. Romney said he was enthusiastic about this assignment and addressed himself at length to it, citing examples of how private initiative had secured jobs and training for the urban poor.

He was asked if such efforts under the Nixon Administration would supplant Government action.

"I don't think it substitutes, generally speaking," Mr. Romney said. "It supplements but does not substitute for the level of spending you now have at H.U.D."

Mr. Romney said he would push within the Administration for giving the needs of the cities high priority.

"A reordering of priorities is one of the things we will face," he said.

'Self-declaration' plan for welfare ignites lively debate

By Jo Ann Levine
Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

Boston

When Wilbur J. Cohen, who heads the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW), trumpeted a halt last month to burdensome investigations of welfare applicants, he hit a sour note with taxpayers, legislators, and even public-welfare officials.

Under Secretary Cohen's plan, all welfare departments would be required to adopt a "self-declaration" system by July 1, 1969. Already adopted partially in 22 states and completely in 14, this system is one in which a welfare recipient fills out his own application form at home, much as he would fill out an income-tax form.

If his application is approved, he could receive a welfare check within the month without ever having personal contact with a social worker at the welfare department. Later he would be told of social services available to him.

First impressions by the public were that the program was "untried" and would mean a welfare "giveaway." Legislators have since been swamping HEW in Washington for information about the declaration form.

In Massachusetts, the Joint Legislative Committee on Social Welfare responded to its conception of the plan and voted to recommend that it not be adopted in the commonwealth.

Timing criticized

Welfare officials favorable and familiar with the declaration system are not deterred from criticizing Mr. Cohen by the fact that the secretary promised Dr. Ralph Abernathy and the Poor People's Campaign last summer that he would set the plan in motion. They say the outgoing secretary's announcement was "tactlessly released to an unprepared public" and was "calculated to be postelection."

The adoption of a declaration system nationwide would serve to structure the welfare department in such a way, that, should Congress ever make the decision, the income-maintenance portion of welfare could be lifted right out of welfare departments and be administered through another agency, such as the Social Security Administration.

The primary purpose of the declaration system at this time is to maintain the dignity and self-respect of a poor person applying for welfare while increasing the efficiency of welfare personnel, simplifying paperwork, and speeding up accounting procedures.

"I don't see how Secretary Cohen's policy is going to be fully operational by July 1, 1969; if you do a rush job, you are not going to work the kinks out of it," said Paul LeVecque, supervisior of field operations in the Division of Family Services, Maine Department of Health and Welfare.

HEW officials say that the states would have gradually adopted the declaration form anyway, "just because it makes sense."

For example, all but two of the New England states are using some type of declaration form in all or part of their welfare programs. The idea was voluntarily picked up because it seemed to be working in the states where it was being tried.

Maine, a state which now uses the most advanced declaration system, according to regional officials of HEW, reported that in fiscal year 1964, 8 percent of its public-assistance recipients were receiving aid illegally.

But in 1966, the year the declaration form was adopted for applications in the "adult categories"—aid to the blind, the "totally and permanently disabled," the aged—illegal claims dropped 2.5 percent.

In fiscal 1968, they were down to 1 percent.

"You can't get much lower than 1 percent," said Mr. LeVecque. He explained that the 1964 ineligibility rate of 8 percent in Maine "was not because people cheated, but because some of our policies were so complex that when we checked cases we would find mistakes we had made."

HEW reports that the national ineligibility rate when forms are filled out by welfare workers is 1.7 percent in the adult categories and 1.6 for families receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children. These figures were taken from cases handled from April 1, 1967, to March 31, 1968.

Social-welfare administrators generally have been cautious about the declaration system, because they tend to fear public and legislative reaction.

Opinion obtained

Complained one social worker, "The public seems to feel that needy people change into cheaters and raiders of the public treasury the day they ask their government for help."

Mr. LeVecque reports: "We are just beginning to get public opinion. For a while, nothing at all was said. . . . Now that we are moving into AFDC [Aid to Families with Dependent Children], there is some reaction. The legislators are coming [into session] in January, and they don't quite trust it. . . . We will be watched very closely. The legislators just have to understand that we don't automatically grant a check to every client who writes in."

New Hampshire is a state which hopes to include the AFDC category on the declaration system by July, 1969. The state has been adjusting to using the declaration form in its adult-assistance categories since July of 1967.

Says Thomas Hooker, director of the Division of Family Services in the New Hampshire Department of Public Welfare, "That we are using the declaration form doesn't seem to be so widely known here, and the welfare department has not made a big issue of it. We have, however, assured ourselves that it is working properly."

The impact on social workers in the public-welfare departments has been dramatic. In Maine and New Hampshire, social workers no longer have to deal with a client's eligibility and some of them "don't know what to do with themselves," says Mr. Hooker.

Says Mr. LeVecque, "Social workers can no longer say, 'I don't have any time to give services because I'm so busy establishing eligibility.' . . . A few social workers have said, 'This isn't for me,' and have resigned."

Welfare recipients appear to respond in two ways: either they feel pride in being

PRIDE IS PLANNING 2 MORE VENTURES

By Phil Casey
Washington Post Staff Writer

Pride, Inc., leaders said yesterday they hope to establish at least two more businesses in the next six months, and have long-range hopes for a black-operated shopping complex.

But Pride gave no details on what the new enterprises might be. Pride, which has nearly 1000 black members in its various programs, operates a sevice station and a landscaping business now.

Marion Barry, director of operations, said Pride is developing a narcotics program aimed at preventing use of heroin and other addictive drugs. It also works with addicts who want to be helped and employs them while they are trying to stop using drugs.

Pride's role is that of "economic development" of the black community, said Barry, who with Carroll Harvey, Pride's executive director, held a news conference to recite the various programs Pride has sponsored and developed to help ghetto youth.

Pride helps youths to return to the school system, operates a credit union, an on-job training program, an education department and a major community clean-up program.

Barry said Pride cleans an average of 1000 blocks and alleys a month and kills 10,000 rats a month.

"Pride has killed 160,000 rats so far," Barry said, and has conducted several special clean-up programs in ghetto areas.

"We at Pride said we were going to put dudes who had been left out, pushed out, kicked out or dropped out of school and dudes who had multiple jail records, in positions of responsibility and trust . . .," Barry said.

"We knew from the very beginning we would have problems. Not only did we have men who had been hustling all their lives, but also men who had lived a life of extreme violence and alienation, men who had no sense of discipline, no sense of good work habits.

"We at Pride are committed to developing these men to their fullest potential. In most we are succeeding, but with a few we have failed. However, our track record is better than the National Training School and other job programs," he added.

PRESIDENT SAYS NATION MUST PROVIDE TRAINING, JOBS FOR UNEMPLOYED AND CURB THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

WASHINGTON -- President Nixon has reiterated the Administration's pledge to provide the unemployed with training and jobs and to combat inflation in a message to the AFL-CIO Executive Council.

"These are not merely economic issues," he said. "They are, fundamentally, moral issues. It is as immoral to stop a man from getting a job for which he is qualified as it is to allow a worker to be robbed of his money by inflation.

Text of the message -- sent to the AFL-CIO body which convened its winter meeting in Bal Harbour, Florida -- follows:

Greetings to the members of the AFL-CIO Executive Council as you meet to discuss and seek solutions to our economic and social problems.

Over one hundred years ago Abraham Lincoln said: "Labor is the great source from which nearly all, if not all, human comforts and necessities are drawn." The central social and economic questions of our time: can we as a free people make that source available to those who have been denied its use and can we maintain a stable economy that will enable all workers to purchase those "comforts and necessities" without the cruel, hidden tax of inflation?

This Administration says we must -- and we can. The unskilled and unemployed American must be provided training and job opportunities; the workingman must know the dollar he earns is not being secretly eaten away by inflation even as he earns it. These are not merely economic issues. They are, fundamentally, moral issues. It is as immoral to stop a man from getting a job for which he is qualified as it is to allow a worker to be robbed of his money by inflation.

I know you and all the members of the AFL-CIO share these goals, for they are goals of decency and respect for workingmen everywhere. Working together, I know we can attain these goals. It is my hope that out of your deliberations come solutions that help America confront the problems of the seventies with the determination and common sense typical of the American workingman.

Computer Locates Work For Baltimore Jobless

BALTIMORE April 21 AP) —A year ago, the idea was born of establishing a single clearinghouse for persons needing jobs and employers seeking workers.

Through use of a computer, an up-to-date list of the thousands of jobs currently available now is turned out every weekday morning.

Today the Job Bank, as it is called, has come far enough that Baltimore people are teaching other cities how to do it.

The program is ready to start in Chicago, St. Louis, Atlanta, Hartford, Conn., and Portland Ore. Another dozen cities are expected to open job banks by July 1.

"I'm a little overwhelmed" says J. Donn Aiken, lean, white-haired director of the Maryland Employment Service and creator of the project.

"It is so simple when you look at it work, you wonder why in the name of God it was never done before."

Federal Funds

In March, 1968, employers were besieged by requests to list their openings from all of the many programs financed by Federal funds.

Aiken and Eugene B. Moore Jr., general manager of the Chamber of Commerce, then met with representatives of 30 agencies that touch on manpower to devise something to halt the flood.

The mechanical process of the Job Bank begins at Aiken's office at 6:30 p.m. By 1 or 2 a.m. a computer and a copier have turned out 29 copies of pages containing thousands of current job openings.

The pages are assembled into books and distributed by morning to Aiken's placement counselors and the city's anti-poverty agencies. More than 30 pieces of information are listed for each opening, ranging from a $1.50-an-hour kitchen helper to a $14,000-a-year marine architect.

Good Jobs

"When we first began we listed 3000 openings a day. Right now we're carrying 9000 to 10,000," Aiken said.

The Job Bank opened May 27, 1968. "In the first six months, we placed 36 per cent more hardcore unemployed than at any other time," Aiken said.

He estimated that "60 per cent to 70 per cent of the employers in the metropolitan area are listing with us."

"Our chief charge today is dealing with the disadvantaged," Aiken said. But he said much of the work is with senior citizens, and contended the Job Bank is not just for the hard-core jobless.

State Employes

Job Bank workers are State employes paid by Federal funds. It started with $56,000 a year and now spends $150,000.

Westinghouse and Bethlehem Steel are among the large employers in this area using the Job Bank. "As far as we're concerned, it's working well," said a Westinghouse spokesman.

James Chavis, director of the Neighborhood Youth Corps, calls the bank "a very good idea" but he has reservations.

"The Job Bank helps people with education, or who have a —skill—it helps them tremendously. For those locked out, it is not providing jobs—low skilled, low education people, especially young black people in Baltimore's ghettos."

Textile Firm Denies Bias In Hiring

Special to The Washington Post

GREENVILLE, S.C. April 21—Robert S. Small, president and chief executive officer of the Dan River Mills, said today that the company has been committed to a positive program of non-discrimination in employment for years.

He cited figures for the last five years. Between 1964 and 1969, he said, the employment of minorities has more than doubled. The company now has about 3200 employes who are members of minority groups and this is approximately 17 per cent of the company's work force of 19,000, he said. In 1964, he said the company had 17,600 employes of whom about 1500 or 9 per cent were members of minority groups.

Post - Graduate Choice Difficult For Negro Business Students

By Robert J. Samuelson
Washington Post Staff Writer

ST. LOUIS, Mo., April 18—"I'm at a crossroads where I have to make up my mind: do I join the corporate structure or . . . do I get involved directly with my people?"

In those terms a 28-year-old Negro, one of the few blacks who will receive Masters of Business Administration degrees this year, described his own career dilemma. He spoke to a predominately white audience at a conference here this week on "Turmoil on the College Campus and It's Implications for Business."

The student, Thomas Bourelly, said that university-educated Negroes cannot desert their communities.

"We believe in collective salvation," he said, "we are all in the same bag—some of us are at the top, some at the bottom, but we're all in the same bag."

In an interview, Bourelly elaborated on plans which he believes reconcile personal ambition with group loyalty. Along with six colleagues who are also receiving MBA degrees, he will form a black investment company.

The seven will first spend a year or two in existing firms. It is essential, Bourelly said, that the firms not be too large. Jobs in big firms, he said, tend toward specialization, and the seven want positions "where we get to make business decisions and develop business judgment."

Simultaneously, the seven will solicit white money—$5 million for the first 18 to 24 months. This capital will put the group in business.

Whites are expected to play a large role not only in providing capital, but also in lending early management guidance ("to minimize our errors") and supplying business for the fledgling firms.

A good example is a printing firm now envisioned. A white printer, whom Bourelly describes as an "unusual man," has already agreed to act as the group's consultant and to "put his whole staff at our disposal" in the training of new black printers.

The next step would be to persuade large white companies to divert a portion of their commercial printing to the firm. According to Bourelly this approach would force white businesses to put money behind their "social consciences." Simultaneously, it would reduce the printing firm's marketing costs.

Eventually, the group would diversify in a number of areas, including housing construction in black neighborhoods, construction bonding for predominantly black construction firms, and electronic manufacturing.

Blacks would retain a majoritu control over the businesses, and under the original investment agreements there would be buy-back provisions. Thus, Blacks could eventually buy out the original white investors.

"The whole idea," he said, "is that you develop business expertise and reinvest it in the black community."

Cranston Appeals to Nixon To Delay Job Corps Cuts

By DANA BULLEN
Star Staff Writer

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., has urged President Nixon to defer steps, already begun to shut down 59 Job Corps centers by July 1.

He told the President in a telegram last night that delay is needed if Congress is to be permitted "to proceed meaningfully" in considering the controversial shutdown plan.

The news that initial steps were being taken aimed at closing down the centers—and Cranston's wire to the President—came after a bumpy start of Senate hearings on the issue yesterday.

11,000 Interviewed

After a session of the Senate Manpower and Poverty subcommittee was temporarily blocked by Sen. Winston L. Prouty, R-Vt., pollster Louis Harris laid out stacks of figures showing that Job Corps training helps underprivileged youths.

As he had indicated at earlier House hearings, Harris said interviews with more than 11,000 persons, including Job Corpsmen, their families and employers, showed that the training made a big initial difference.

In the first six months after training, Harris said, youths made 38 cents more an hour. After 12 months, he said, hourly wages increased again by 7 cents an hour.

The figures showed that benefits from Job Corps training tended to lessen with time, indicating in Harris's view that former poor environments might be reasserting their grip.

The pollster, who studied the Job Corps for the Office of Economic Opportunity, saw a need for followup measures after youths complete Job Corps programs and begin work.

Cranston, before it became known that moves to close some centers were under way, said during the hearing he would ask the Senate to approve a resolution stating that no Job Corps installations should be shut down until Congress completes normal legislative and budgetary deliberations on the program.

Would Apply Pressure

If approved, such a resolution would not be binding on the administration, but it would place great pressure on officials to delay shutdowns while Conducted its study.

"The Congress has a right to study this very carefully before steps are taken," Cranston said.

Bertrand Harding, acting OEO director, confirmed reports from Cranston's office that notices have gone to some centers directing preliminary steps, such as a halt in contracting for future services, aimed at a shutdown of these centers.

Aides to Cranston said they understood telegrams went out yesterday to seven centers. On Monday, these sources said, 45 more notices will be sent to other centers scheduled to close.

Harding emphasized that the notices are only an initial step to put shutdown processes in motion.

The seven Job Corps centers notified to begin shutdown procedures are installations at Camp Kilmer, N.J.; Oak Glen, Calif.; Marquette, Mich.; Huntington, W.Va., and three facilities in Puerto Rico.

House Unit Summoned

In the House, meanwhile, chairman Carl D. Perkins, D-Ky., summoned his House Education and Labor subcommittee into session today to hear from directors and officials of a number of the Job Corps centers being shut down.

The initial hearing before the Senate Manpower and Poverty subcommittee, headed by Sen. Gaylord Nelson, D-Wis., made it clear the administration's proposals would spark deep controversy, as they already have in the House.

Prouty and Sen. Peter Dominick, R-Colo., questioned Harris closely about methods and conclusions involved in his OEO-financed survey of Job Corps operations.

Prouty charged that members of the subcommittee had not been given time to study Harris's 82-page report. The Vermont Republican also said that administration witnesses should have been the first to testify.

The subcommittee, originally scheduled to begin its hearing at noon but unable to get it under way until an hour-and-a-half later because of Prouty's objection to the starting time, is scheduled to hear testimony by Secretary of Labor George Shultz on Friday. Shultz will appear before Perkins' panel Monday.

TV: False Notions About Welfare Are Examined

Number Who Can Work Found to Be Small

By GEORGE GENT

FOR its next-to-final program, the Public Broadcast Laboratory Sunday offered informative reports on two different but interrelated aspects of the current revolution of the poor.

The program, seen on Channel 13 here, looked first at the growing resentment against public welfare in "None of My Business." While little was disclosed that had not been reported elsewhere, the segment neatly skewered the widely held belief that the welfare rolls are populated largely by people too lazy to work.

Fifty per cent of the 8.5 million people on welfare are children under 18, and 40 per cent are made up of the blind, the aged and the permanently disabled. Only 10 per cent can be called employable and it was pointed out that most of the nation's 22 million poor are already regularly employed.

The notion that the poor like welfare was disputed in testimony after testimony before a hearing in Fresno County, Calif., of the President's Commission on Income Maintenance Programs. There, black and white, Mexican-Americans and Anglo-Americans, affirmed their dislike for the programs because of the indignities visited upon them in applying. Many were ignoring their rights to welfare rather than suffer these indignities.

Welfare programs, it was shown, are costly, complicated and inequitable, but the commission found that public support for some sort of income maintenance for the poor was growing. The poor agricultural worker has begun to wonder why the Government can pay subsidies to his farm employer not to grow crops, but cannot subsidize his necessities.

The inequity, the program pointed out, has been called socialism for the rich and free enterprise for the poor. The patience of the poor is ending.

The second part of the program was devoted to a moving study of the new militancy among the nation's Mexican - Americans. Long ground down in poverty as agricultural workers, the Mexican-Americans, like the Southern Negroes, have been uprooted by technology and more and more are becoming an urban people. Like the Negroes, they are becoming aware that their poverty and ignorance are socially induced and are not part of the nature of things and they have begun to demand their rightful place in American society. The new thrust is toward more education and a new inculcation of Hispanic culture.

Pride of race—defined as "enduring spirit"—is the message of America's second oldest settlers. In the vineyards of Delano, Calif., and in the barrios of Los Angeles, the message is coming in loud and clear.

Bill to Speed Collections Of Jobless Tax Advances

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The House Ways and Means Committee approved a bill that would require most employers to pay the Federal unemployment tax on a quarterly rather than an annual basis.

The accelerated payment schedule is necessary because administrative costs of the Federal-state unemployment insurance program and the public employment services are outstripping revenue, according to officials of the Administration and of state departments of employment security.

The Administration bill is expected to get Congressional approval without difficulty.

Wages for Mothers: a way to fight poverty

By DAVID G. GIL, Ph.D.

During recent years an awareness of poverty, its high social and economic costs, and its disastrous consequences for those directly affected by it, as well as for society as a whole, has spread throughout the nation. This increasing visibility of poverty has given rise to mounting dissatisfaction with the public welfare system and especially with the program of aid to families with dependent children which was designed more than 30 years ago as one of the nation's defenses against poverty. In response to this general dissatisfaction with the failure of public welfare programs to deal adequately with the massive problem of poverty, a variety of far-reaching proposals have been formulated by economists and other social and political scientists and by political leaders in and outside the government.

The general objective of all these proposals is to assure everyone an adequate share in the affluence of American society as a basic right to enable all people to live decently during all phases of their lives, regardless of economic trends and the many risks connected with age, ill health, and physical, emotional, and social handicaps.

Social Security for Motherhood

The approach I propose may be designated as Mothers' Wages, or Social Security for Motherhood. It is based on the premise that society has a stake in, and an ultimate responsibility for, the rearing of children, since on this function depends the continuity and survival of society. The child's family is in a sense serving as society's agent in carrying out this function. If this is so, then any work performed in bringing up a child constitutes an important social task for which society should compensate those who have to disengage from, or to stay out of, the labor market to perform it. For society to accept the ultimate responsibility for rearing the next generation of citizens and to compensate mothers for their investment of time, energy, and work in assuming responsibility would be quite consistent with 19th and 20th century social and legal developments concerning the status of children. Indeed, unless society compensates mothers for their voluntary-yet-forced withdrawal from the labor market and for their assumption of the essential tasks of child bearing and rearing, it is actually relying on "slave labor" in exploiting women's biological roles and psychological tendencies.

Society has gradually accepted the responsibility for rearing and socializing children who are under the supervision of persons other than their biological or adopted parents. No one today seriously questions the appropriateness of compensating teachers and institutional workers for their investment of time, energy and work on behalf of children assigned to their care and few question the appropriateness of compensating foster parents, although the compensation may be far from adequate.

It would seem therefore, that society should pay an appropriate wage to every mother and expectant mother for as long as child bearing and rearing tasks keep them outside the labor market, whether or not by choice. The level of the mothers' wages should be fixed by federal law to correspond at least to the minimum wage under the Fair Labor Standards Act, and thus every mother would be assured an income well above the poverty level. If wages were computed for only 8 hours per day, 7 days per week, a mother would receive about $90 per week, or $4,680 per year.

Child Care a Full-Time Responsibility

Under such a system mothers' wages would not vary in relation to the number of children under care, since their purpose would be to compensate the mother for staying out of the labor market to invest effort in a societal function. The number of children in the mother's care would not change this context. The wages, however, would vary in relation to the extent to which the mothers did or did not participate in the labor market. A mother who undertook part-time employment or self-employment would receive mothers' wages on a prorated basis. A mother who engaged in full-time employment would receive a fixed fraction of the mother's wage, in recognition of the fact that child rearing involves an around-the-clock, 365 days-a-year, stand-by maternal responsibility.

The age of the children in a mother's care might be another factor in varying the wage level since the time commitment a mother must make to child rearing tasks varies with the age of the child. Before the child enters school, the mother's investment in child rearing is total. From that point on, under normal circumstances, the mother's investment of time and effort in child rearing decreases and she may no longer need to stay completely out of the labor market.

All Mothers Would Be Eligible

Since the only criteria for paying mothers' wages and determining their amount would be the status of motherhood or expectant motherhood and the extent of attachment to the labor market, all mothers who qualified under these criteria would be entitled to compensation irrespective of their legal and financial status. Thus mothers would not be stigmatized for receiving such wages. Marital status, property, and other sources of income would be disregarded in determining eligibility. However, since the mothers' wages would be taxable income, regular taxation mechanism would return excess income to society.

Mothers' wages as proposed here are conceived of as an entitlement related to a specified societal context, motherhood, and disengagement from the labor market. Thus conceptualized, a program of mothers' wages fits the social security model and the Social Security Administration becomes the most appropriate and economic government mechanism to administer it. To obtain her wage, an expectant mother would register her claim at a social security office, and checks would be issued to her automatically as long as she continued to be eligible. The cost of the program could be met partly through raising the base for social security deductions and partly from general revenue, which would increase because mothers who received societal wages could not be claimed as dependents for income purposes.

It would seem to be desirable to link the mothers' wages plan proposed here with a system of children's allowances to which all legal minors would be entitled. This combination of programs would assure proportionally larger incomes for larger families.

I am aware that a proposal for mothers' wages raises many complicated issues requiring thorough exploration. However, it would be unrealistic to expect easy solutions to as complex a problem as poverty in America. People who are discouraged by the complexities involved in eliminating poverty should remember that preserving the status quo of a society divided in affluent and poverty-stricken segments might be even more complicated a task than bringing about social justice.

Welfare at Crossroads

Nixon Men Study Alternate Aids to Poor: National Minimums or Guaranteed Income

By JONATHAN SPIVAK
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—As the Nixon Administration begins the final stages of shaping its much-heralded welfare reform program, two dramatically different concepts are being hotly debated by top officials.

One would couple a national minimum standard under existing welfare programs with a separate plan for sharing Federal revenue with the states.

The alternative concept would replace current welfare programs for needy families with an entirely new effort called the Family Security System. In effect, FSS would be a modest form of negative tax or guaranteed income plan, although proponents avoid such labels.

The first approach, favored by White House Counselor Arthur Burns and other conservatives, also would emphasize work-training, day care and other programs in an effort to trim relief rolls in the long run. But it would immediately increase Federal welfare outlays by $300 million to $400 million a year, plus a good deal more if revenue sharing and other expenses are added in. Its main aim is to preserve and perfect the existing Federal-state welfare system.

The competing approach, fostered by Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Finch and favored by social activists in the Administration, is intended to assure that a penniless family of four receives $1,500 in Federal payments annually. But the payments would decline progressively as the family's outside income increased, and would end entirely at an earnings level of $3,000 a year. The additional cost of the FSS plan, along with a Finch-favored Federal standard in payments for aged and other welfare recipients, would be about $1.6 billion a year.

Compromise Possible

Officials say the President hasn't hinted which approach he favors, and in the end some kind of compromise might be adopted. Possible mixtures of minimum welfare standards, work-training plans, guaranteed income for some workers and revenue sharing are almost limitless. At any rate, a Presidential decision is expected within a month or so, followed by presentation of the program to Congress.

The Burns and Finch plans are poles apart, both in philosophy and practical approach. Mr. Finch believes that a dramatic departure from the Depression-spawned Federal-state public welfare system is the best way to achieve reform. Mr. Burns, on the other hand, prefers to keep intact the existing system, which leaves most administrative authority in the states and requires states to furnish a portion of public-assistance payments.

The HEW Secretary is seeking an entirely Federally financed and administered program that would put cash in the hands of all low-income families, yet still make it advantageous for them to work. The aim is to supplement incomes of "working poor" families—an estimated six million to seven million people.

Not only would this approach strengthen families that might otherwise break up, Mr. Finch argues, it also would tend to increase incentives to work. Thus, Mr. Finch insists, "to include the working poor isn't basically a left-ish" initiative, but rather is an essentially conservative move that nevertheless appeals to liberals. Further, he says, it would place aid directly in the hands of the poor, so that the individual has the option to deal with his own problems.

Mr. Burns believes that welfare should be extended only to those who are unable to support themselves. The work incentives that underlie the free enterprise system will be eroded if welfare becomes a "right" for all the poor, Mr. Burns reasons. "It seems inescapable that more and more people would make the purely rational decision to remain idle rather than work," he says. There's a great risk, he warns, "of a corrosive effect on moral values and attitudes, not only in the case of recipient adults but on their children as well," he adds.

Mr. Burns would make more adequate grants to some of the six million recipients currently on the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) rolls and would expand the program to include more of the poor, at least in the short run. But major long-term reliance would be placed on a major expansion of work-training programs, day care and other endeavors, already under way on a small scale, to turn welfare recipients into tax-paying, self-sufficient workers.

Prolonged Debate Seen

The total Federal-state cost of public assistance programs is about $7 billion a year, covering more than nine million recipients. Little public controversy surrounds the so-called adult categories—the aged, blind and disabled. The big issue is AFDC, which is rising at more than 10% a year. The local financial burden of AFDC has become a prime political problem in many states, and Mr. Nixon, during the campaign and after his election, promised significant reforms.

Although the President is expected to make his final choice within a few weeks, some officials believe the issues are so complex and the plans so far apart that the debate could drag on well into the summer. The changes aren't intended to take effect until July 1, 1970, or possibly a year later.

The slow start, of course, will help hold down immediate expenditures and give Congress more time for careful consideration. Overall, it's expected, any combination of welfare reform, work training and revenue sharing will add at least $1 billion a year to welfare costs at the start.

The Burns plan probably is less expensive and less controversial. But whatever the President proposes is sure to encounter obstacles in Congress. Conservatives who control some of the key committees are loath to approve increases in welfare spending.

STATE TO HANDLE YOUTH JOB FUNDS

U.S. Bypasses City to Pay $14.7-Million to 42,000 in Summer Program

By EMANUEL PERLMUTTER

The state will handle all the money to be paid to the 42,000 youngsters who are going to be employed in the city this summer in the federally financial Neighborhood Youth Corps program.

The Federal Government has asked the State Division of Employment to assume responsibility for the $14.7-million that Washington is providing for the summer youth job program here. This action follows disclosures of frauds, thefts and mismanagements in the city's Human Resources Administration, which runs the antipoverty programs here.

In confirming the new procedure, Edward L. Weintraub, regional information director for the United States of Labor, said last night that this was the first time that such a measure of fiscal control over Neighborhood Youth projects has been shifted by the Federal Government from a city to a state.

"You can consider this a pilot project, in a sense," he said.

"We didn't seek this assignment, the Federal Government asked us to do it, "Alfred L. Green, the executive director

Dispute Over Vocational Schools Revived

Extensive delays in plans to abolish the city's multi-trade vocational high schools have led to a renewal of the dispute over the school's quality and usefulness.

Not since 1965, when the Board of Education decided to combine academic and vocational studies in single comprehensive high schools that would "improve education and enhance integration," has the controversy over vocational schools appeared so divisive.

Proponents of vocational schools argue that many of them are getting better and should be retained — as Sidney Platt, the principal of Eli Whitney Vocational High School in Brooklyn, puts it — to "help kids get their feet on the ladder of success."

Advocates of the comprehensive schools are alarmed that not one has been opened, largely because of construction delays. They fear that further postponements and opposition may undermine the change-over and rob students of broad educational and job opportunities.

Review Sought

Mr. Platt, who is president of the Vocational High School Principal's Association, said his group would ask the new interim Board of Education to review the policy on comprehensive schools "in the light of newer thinking."

The comprehensive schools would only "water down and fragment" occupational education, he added, but strengthened vocational schools would offer academic work, and "at the same time give the youngsters the ability to make a living."

"We're not engaged in animal training," Mr. Platt said, "and we want flexibility. However we don't want flexibility for devaluing. And we think the citizens should have some say in whether they're ready to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in the comprehensive idea."

Also distressed, but for different reasons, are the educators and laymen who want the comprehensive program speeded up.

"The situation is really indefensible," said Mrs. Alexander Katz, chairman of the education committee of the Women's City Club and projector director of the Public Education Association's committee on education, guidance and work.

"It means that for five years we've just been marking time," she said, "and for kids it means that they are no better equipped than before to enter the labor market or continue their education."

Called Out-of-Date

Mrs. Katz said the vocational schools, which have 42,000 students, "haven't really retooled to help kids find their way" to higher education.

She also said the "nature of the job market," had made obsolete the kind of training that has been given in vocational schools here—but not trade training as such.

"The increasingly white collar market puts a high premium on basic skills — reading, writing, thinking and words and numbers," Mrs. Katz said.

While the arguments go on, so do the remaining 23 multi-trade vocational schools and the five specialized schools—Art and Design, Automotive, Aviation, Fashion and Printing.

The latter would not be changed with the advent of the comprehensive school, but the multi-trade schools, under present plans, would be eliminated.

School Seem Calm

The routine in many multi-trade schools appears to be little affected by their fate. Reinforcing this sense of order is the fact that they have been largely free of the student unrest that has troubled many academic schools.

The exterior of Central Commercial High School in Manhattan is freshly painted and the steady beat of typewriters can be heard across the front courtyard.

At Clara Barton High in Brooklyn, two new dental operating rooms have been added with Federal aid. In some schools, courses in such fields as data processing, electronics and appliance repair have replaced millinery, sheet metal and other studies in reduced demand.

Many youths who have stayed in the vocational schools even while hundreds were dropping out are quick to express their satisfaction.

Evilio Ortiz, a senior at Eli Whitney, interrupted his tacking in an upholstery class the other day, and joined a few students summing up their views of the school.

"To me," he said, "Whitney is the greatest."

The vocational schools have long been charged with being a "dumping ground."

Five years ago, when 22 per cent of the students in the 60 academic high schools were Negroes and Puerto Ricans, the comparable figure in the vocational schools was 48 per cent. In 1967, Negroes and Puerto Ricans made up 34 per cent of the enrollment in the academic schools; 60 per cent in the vocational schools.

A number of school officials concede that the "dumping ground" charges may have had some truth a decade ago. Now, they maintain, many of the vocational schools have instituted screening measures and are receiving abler students.

"The vocational schools are no longer the dumping ground in this town," said Eli E. Cohen, chairman of the Board of Education's advisory committee on vocational education and executive secretary of the National Committee on the Employment of Youth.

Mr. Cohen said that 15 to 20 per cent of the vocational graduates were going on to some form of higher education — particularly in two-year community colleges—and that 75 to 80 per cent of the graduates immediately available for work were finding jobs in fields in which they were trained.

However, he conceded that "the really soul-searching question" of whether time in the vocational high schools was efficiently spent in terms of students' long-range needs was unanswered. In the absence of follow-up studies, he said, "we really don't know for sure what difference it made that a student took a vocational course."

The matter of the vocational [illegible]fulness to business and industry is also much debated.

The Board of Education reported that of the 7,585 graduates in 1967, a total of 4,724 were available for employment at once. It said that 4,508 had ben hired and that 3,679, or 77.9 per cent had taken work outside their special areas, and 4.5 per cent were unemployed six months after graduation.

Job Placement Rates

In descending order, the highest rates of job placements by trades offered in four or more schools were in secretarial practice, business education, stenography, commerce, practical nursing, bookkeeping, printing, distributive education (marketing, retailng), cosmetology, women's wear manufacturing, machine shop mechanics, sheet metal and auto mechanics. All were above 70 per cent.

Mrs. Katz argued that many of the most successful trades could easily be included in comprehensive high schools, with less focus on specialization, and that business and industry could provide more on-the-job training for students who wanted it.

She also insited that the comprehnsive schools — or even the academic high schools—czould serve many students at less expense. The per pupil cost in the vocational high schools in 1966-67 was $1,766; in the academic schools, $1,164.

Mr. Platt contended that the extra cost was justified and that it was "criminal that people are being misled into thinking that certain jobs are disappearing" or that industry would pick up any slack in high-skill training.

"You just try to get a roofer or a carpenter or an electrician or a plumber," he said.

Seelig Lester, the Deputy Superintendent of Schools for instruction and curriculum, said that a recent survey of 1,000 businesses and industries here had shown a preference for prospective employes who were both skilled in a trade and generally well-educated.

"If we can't give them both," he added, "they'd rather have the kid who was well-rounded and they'll train him."

Herbert Bienstock, regional director of the Federal Bureau of Labor Statistics, said he was "not at all sure you can train secondary school students for specific job openings" in coming years.

Where Jobs Will Be

Three weeks ago, in a survey of the city economy, Mr. Bienstock said that job increases in the next decade "will be largely in occupations characterized by higher levels of educational attainment."

Yet most employment opportunities, he noted, "develop as a result of labor attrition rather than through industrial expansion."

"Large numbers of job openings in the city in the decade from 1965 to 1975 will result from repdacement needs," he said, "many in job categories with only modest educational requirements."

Whatever the progress, the anxieties over vocational schools presist.

A plea for restudying "the whole concept of where we're going in vocational education" was entered yesterday by Morris Iushevitz, who until his term on the Board of Education expired this month headed a committee on occupational training.

Mr. Iushevitz described the vocational schools as "antiquated." He also criticized the program for comprehensive schools.

"What we're getting," he said, "is neither fish nor fowl nor good red herring. The whole thing has been swept under the rug but it has [illegible] brought out. We have to [illegible]n for the modern age."

Women Considered Disadvantaged Also

By MARY BRINKERHOFF

Mrs. Elizabeth Duncan Koontz, the first Negro ever to head the U.S. Women's Bureau, spent nearly a quarter of a century dealing with slow learners and the disadvantaged.

The fact is, she never has stopped.

But Mrs. Koontz hopes things will get better, both for the disadvantaged — women — and for the slow learners, those who cherish the "mythology" of prejudice against them.

There's every logical reason to look for improvement, the articulate teacher-turned-bureaucrat told reporters and local leaders who turned out to greet her during a fast stop at Love Field Tuesday. The question of using or wasting female talent "matters a lot to the economy now, you see, not just to women."

So far, she conceded, "we're still pretty much at the bottom," less because of outright, conscious prejudice against women than because of "something which I think is worse: absolute unawareness of their existence."

Mrs. Koontz, on her way back to work after a speaking date at College Station, stopped off to help the Dallas regional office of the Women's Bureau mark its fifth anniversary. She and Miss Rhobia C. Taylor, regional director, cut a birthday cake in the Braniff Airways press room.

Last July, the teacher from Salisbury, N.C.—wife of Harry L. Koontz, a teacher and athletic director—took over the presidency of the National Education Association at a convention in Dallas. She was the first of her race in that job too.

Early this year, Mrs. Koontz was appointed U.S. delegate to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women. Eight days later came her selection to head the Women's Bureau.

In this "sub-cabinet" job, she became the first woman placed in a high-ranking post by the Nixon administration, itself criticized in some quarters for slighting female talent. Mrs. Koontz Tuesday referred questioners who brought up such criticism to the President himself.

She said that the Women's Bureau will work to open new fields of employment and advancemenn to women, to further their training, to expand child-care facilities, to study still-existing laws which hinder their full achievement.

Other Koontz comments Tuesday:

Employers still look for "the best man" to fill a post and often don't even think of visiting women's colleges.

It's important to change the attitudes of personnel directors, but success in fighting job discrimination depends on the willingness of individual women to speak up. Many newspaper "help wanted" advertisements still reflect discrimination.

A woman can take time to work and still be a good mother. "We don't require 24 hours on the job from anybody else."

Child-care centers can help not only children of working mothers but kids from affluent families who must learn sooner or later to share the world with those different from themselves.

Household workers must be provided adequate standards of pay, performance and training.

Young husbands today take pride in working wives, companinship in marriage and the sharing of household duties. "Thank God for the barbecue pit, a manly way of cooking."

Computor System Tested in Newton

By SHIRLEY GOLDWYN

A $1.8 million, three-year project to develop a computer guidance system is being field tested in Newton schools. The plan will help students and guidance counselors make career and college choices.

Called the Information System for Vocational Decisions, and funded by the U.S. Office of Education, the project has involved the Harvard School of Education, New England Data Systems and the Newton public schools.

Sophisticated computers have been placed in Newton High School, Bigelow Junior High School, Hamilton Elementary School and WEMBROC (West Metropolitan Boston Regional Opportunity Council).

SIXTEEN JUNIORS who agreed to take part in the field tests have been involved at Newton High School since the computer was installed in April.

They were scheduled to work with the computer at the Career Guidance Resource Center at the high school once a week under the supervision of Mrs. Martha Trachtenberg, the counselor in charge of the center.

The computer is equipped to give information about colleges, occupations, trade and vocational schools and career opportunities in the military.

If a student is interested in using the computer to help him select a college, he asks it questions. He may indicate his wish to stay in New England or the Middle Atlantic States. The computer may respond with a further question to help narrow the field. It may ask "What size college?"

Through a continuing give and take, the student may find that there are 10 colleges of the kind in which he is interested which he may wish to investigate further.

THOUGH GRADES and college board examination scores are not included, the student's class rank may be, thus helping him to be realistic about his goals.

The same technique is used for jobs. The student might tell the computer that he would like to work with other people. The computer, through the question and answer approach, helps the student to narrow the field and suggests likely possibilities.

The computer also is equipped to show slides of a particular college campus or of people at work in various occupations.

According to Robert Aylmer, a doctoral student at the Harvard School of Education who is working with the project, there is no thought of replacing the guidance counselor in the school.

However, school counselors today are overburdened with detail, and the use of computers to help supply information would free the counselor to perform his real function—that of counseling and helping the students to sort out information and evaluate their own feelings about what they would like to do with their future lives, Aylmer said.

People Want Work, Says Employer

Huntsville (AP)—The president of a company formed to hire hard-core unemployed has said here that contrary to what one hears or reads, "People do want to work."

"If you train people and give them an opportunity to use the training, they will respond," said George W. Craig, president of Ventura Manufacturing Co., San Antonio. Craig was speaking Tuesday at an interagency workshop at Sam Houston State University's Institute of Contemporary Corrections.

Craig told the group he started the company with 200 hard core unemployed workers. He said his company's main objective was to provide training and permanent employment for the group following the president's test cities program.

He said 70 percent of his workers had police records and 40 percent had served time in prison.

His criterion was unemployed or with income of less than $3000 yearly family income.

Negro Farmers Win Grant To Raise Cattle

GREENVILLE, Miss., June 11. — (UPI) — The Ford Foundation has approved a $100,000 grant aimed at helping low-income Negro farmers in Holmes and Issaquena counties become self-sufficient beef cattle operators, it was reported Wednesday.

The grant went to the center for community change acting on behalf of Milestone Cooperative Association and Mississippi Action for Community Education.

The project got underway earlier this year with an initial grant of $265,153 from the Office of Economic Opportunity. It was designed to help farmers supplement their income by raising cattle on their own property or on land leased through grazing associations.

Summit Assails Schools On Training for Waiters

By LEE SIMOWITZ

The Metropolitan Atlanta Summit Leadership Congress Thursday attacked the Fulton County and Atlanta school systems for submitting a proposal for federal funds to train poor people as waiters and waitresses.

The congress, a biracial organization of community leaders, claimed the two school systems were planning to produce 3,000 waiters and waitresses in 1969-70.

"We demand that the school system use better ways for preparing people to make a living," said the statement. "The school system should not be training poor people to be servants."

"The training of poor people by our public school system to be hand servants for the wall-to-do is inhuman and cannot be allowed," the statement added.

NOT ENOUGH INTERESTED

John Standridge, director of vocational and technical training for the Atlanta school system, said Thursday night that the system has no waiter-waitress training as such because not enough students are interested in taking courses in serving food.

There are no plans to train 3,000 waiters and waitresses in Atlanta, Standridge continued, though there is a food service program at Atlanta Area Technical School that offers courses in various aspects of restaurant management.

"I certainly agree with the statement that we shouldn't be training poor people to take minimum wage-type employment," Standridge said.

REDUCED DEMAND

But the low pay offered to waiters has so reduced demand for courses in that area, he continued, that the only waiter training the system gives is through extension courses to enable waiters already on the job to gain promotions to other positions.

The school system's course offerings are not for low-paying jobs, Standridge said, but rather for fields such as data processing, clerical occupations and accounting.

Heineman Urges Cash Subsidy for All Poor

[Chicago Tribune Press Service]

Pittsburgh, June 16—Federal cash subsidies for all poor persons, whether they work or not, were urged today by Ben W. Heineman, chairman of the President's Commission on Income Maintenance Programs.

At the same time, George Romney, secretary of housing and urban development, warned the nation's mayors that if they want to see an income tax sharing program with the federal government, they will have to get together with the governors of their states.

Speak to U. S. Mayors

Both men made appearances here before 500 mayors attending the United States Conference of Mayors.

Heineman, who is president of Northwest Industries, Inc., and board chairman of the Chicago and North Western railway, said that noncategorical cash transfers to the poor is the only logical answer to poverty in America.

"The extension of cash income to all the poor is essential for an effective income maintenance strategy," he said. "Transfers given only to certain groups are inequitable and indefensible. Thus, fundamentally we must ask of our income maintenance programs that they transfer incomes. The poor need and must have cash."

Heineman said any such program must have built-in work incentives.

"Income transfer systems can be made reconcilable with the preservation of work incentives," he said. "By changing a household's income transfer grant 50 cents, for example, for each dollar earned, a worker will always have a higher net income than a nonworker with a similar sized family."

Current welfare and social insurance programs do not work in this country, Heineman maintained. In addition, "they seem to create almost as many problems as they solve," he said.

"And, unlike the dilemma of many other nations, poverty in the United States is not a problem of national productivity," he said. "Both statistics and our subjective view of affluence in America tell us that our gross national product can amply provide for all our citizens. Our poverty problem is one of distribution, not of production."

Romney, in telling the mayors they must deal with the governors on revenue sharing, was in effect speaking on an issue that has come up several times during the conference.

Mayors Urge Direct Aid

The mayors have been strong in voicing the opinion that federal funds must come directly to the cities, not thru the state capitals. According to the mayors, Vice President Agnew has indicated in recent statements that President Nixon favors funneling the money thru the states.

"The Nixon administration is committed to revenue sharing," Romney said. "If this can be shaped politically so it can secure the approval of the Congress, I think it's going to come.

"But I want to say in all realism, if you're going to get revenue sharing it's only going to come as the result of a coalition between the mayors and the governors," he said. "It's not going to come if the mayors and the governors can't get together. I urge you to take a very hard look at it from that standpoint."

Of all the urban problems, housing is the greatest physical one, he said.

"The national goals, as stated by Congress, understate rather than overstate the housing needs," he said.

One problem, he said, is the climbing cost of housing. The recent 1 per cent increase in the bank prime rate increased the cost of housing by 7 to 10 per cent, he said.

PREJUDICE BLAMED IN UNEMPLOYMENT

Poor Persons Discriminated Against, Model Cities Chairmen Agree

The overriding cause of employment problems and economic development in Model Cities neighborhoods is prejudice toward poor persons and minority groups, three area committee chairmen of the Model Cities economic development agreed Tuesday night.

The chairmen blamed businessmen for emphasizing ability and said poor operating practices and discriminatory personnel tests have resulted in a lack of jobs in the Negro community.

Poor Job Training

The chairmen also said job-training programs are inadequate because of poor co-ordination and follow-up counseling after job placement is nonexistent.

The committees have tentatively established four major economic problems in the black community:

- A greater percentage of men and women in the Model Cities neighborhood are unemployed and underemployed than in the rest of the city.
- Total education for many is inadequate.
- Economic development resources are inadequate.
- Supportive services (child care, transportation, medical and social services) that people might require to be optimally employable are inadequate.

The chairman outlined economic goals for the Negro community, including more successful businessmen and supervisory personnel in industry and more training and work opportunities.

They complained the rise in the minimum wage level had priced many women and teenagers in the black community out of work. Employers hire men instead of either of these because they have to pay the higher wage, the chairmen said.

These and other points are being prepared in a special report which, when approved by all six area chairmen, will be sent to the Model Cities policy planning board for incorporation into the over-all plan.

Urban Coalition Action Council States Views on Administration's Welfare Proposals

The Urban Coalition Action Council praised President Nixon's welfare programs but recommended ways in which they could be improved.

The Executive Committee of the Action Council, the independent legislative arm of the Urban Coalition, met in Washington, D.C., in mid-August to review the Administration's proposals. John W. Gardner, Chairman of the Council, issued the following statement on the committee's behalf:

▪ President Nixon has taken the initiative to reform America's outmoded welfare system. The Urban Coalition Action Council welcomes this major departure and commends the President for moving to correct the serious deficiencies of the current system.

The President's proposals are significant on several counts;

(a) They will provide assistance to the millions of working poor who are totally ignored by the present system.

(b) They will provide income to unemployed parents who are seeking work or training, thereby keeping families together. (In most states today unemployed fathers have to desert their families to make the families eligible for aid.)

(c) They remove the powerful barrier to work which is a gross defect of the present system, and introduce a positive incentive for the individual to enter the job market.

(d) Though the level of support is modest, they take the enormously important step of accepting federal responsibility to place a floor under the income of those eligible for assistance.

(e) They will provide national eligibility standards for those receiving federal assistance under the new program.

We have strongly advocated such measures and we will do all that we can to make them a legislative reality. If that is to come about, all who are concerned for the nation's future must work together to ensure that the best program we can devise is finally written into law. To assure the ultimate success of the program, it must be strengthened in every way possible during the public debate and the legislative deliberations to come. Here are some of the ways in which strengthening could be accomplished:

1. The Administration proposals could be further strengthened by raising the level of funding in order to increase the level of minimum income, to afford relief for those states and municipalities which are being crushed by the spiraling welfare burden and to include single persons and childless couples who are not now covered.

2. The plan proposed by the President ex-

Executive Committee members John V. Lindsay, and Frederick J. Close.

Guaranteed Income

Mr. Chairman, your committee is faced with an extraordinary opportunity. The time has come to discard the existing patchwork of ineffective and in many ways destructive public assistance programs. You have the opportunity to replace them with a national system of income maintenance that will help people to help themselves but preserve individual dignity in aiding those left behind by society.

The Need

The need is manifest. This committee knows all the facts and statistics of poverty.

You know the cost of welfare, but you know also the great cost to society of human neglect. The child whose health needs are denied early medical attention because of poverty may suffer a lifelong handicap and become a lifelong burden to the community. The child whose attitudes and motivation are shaped by the pathology of extreme poverty may become a delinquent or derelict or addict and end up as a burden on society. The cost to society is not to be compared with the human cost. But those who calculate social costs (and someone must) know that for society the day of reckoning always comes. It requires a lot of money to maintain jails, to rehabilitate addicts, to support the victims of early neglect. We can serve human values and social providence at the same time by making such casualties less likely.

Many Americans sincerely believe that people living in poverty are people who don't want to work—or people who don't want steady work. In other words, able-bodied loafers. That is a long way from the truth. Of the 25 million persons living below the poverty line, 15 million are either under 18 or over 65.

Of the remaining 10 million, nine million fall within the scope of the Administration's family assistance proposals (as being adults in poor families that include children). Let us look at that 9 million. The Administration estimates that 7.9 million are already working, but earn too little to bring them above the poverty level, or are the wives of such men, or are disabled, or are women who must stay home because of very young children. That leaves 1.1 million adults who the Administration feels can significantly help themselves and would thus be required to register for jobs or work training—600,000 men and 500,000 mothers of school-aged children.

I emphasize those facts because they suggest the limits of what we may expect from the work requirement. Those who cherish the false notion that the welfare rolls are made up chiefly of able-bodied loafers could easily imagine that the present proposals will bring a sharp reduction in the rolls. If they believe that, they will end up disappointed and angry, because it won't happen. Most people who now receive welfare or would receive it under the new proposals are not candidates for the job market. As the above figures indicate, either they are already working or they are too old, too young, disabled, or mothers of young children.

I need not deal at length with the well-known shortcomings of the present welfare system (or non-system). In 70 per cent of the families receiving benefits the fathers are absent from the home. To the degree that the welfare system has helped to create such a situation it endangers the fabric of our family-based society. And clearly a system in which an American in one state can receive only one eighth of that which his fellow citizen with the same need receives in another

Welfare Reform Plan Bigger Than Nixon's Is Urged by Johnson-Appointed Commission

WASHINGTON—A welfare reform plan similar to the Nixon Administration's proposed family-assistance program, but far broader and more expensive was urged by an advisory commission appointed by former President Johnson.

The commission, headed by Northwest Industries Inc.'s president, Ben W. Heineman, said the Nixon program "represents a major step forward towards meeting the needs that we have documented." But the panel outlined a program that would cover many more poor people and specifically urged it be expanded in the future as current fiscal pressures ease.

The Administration's program is being considered by a skeptical House Ways and Means Committee and is encountering opposition from conservatives and liberals alike. The Heineman report's bigger, costlier version is sure to appeal to the committee's liberals. But Mr. Nixon's biggest problem is convincing conservative Ways and Means members and other Congressmen that his more modest plan won't unduly inflate welfare spending in the short run and will lead ultimately to a decrease in welfare costs by making the poor more self-sufficient.

The Heineman commission estimated its plan would cost an additional $7 billion in Federal funds in the fiscal year that starts July 1, and furnish payments to 36 million poor persons.

The Administration's program calls for added Federal expenditures of $25 billion for cash payments to only 22 million persons. However, the White House also is recommending he expansion of the food stamp programs for an even larger number of the poor, which would increase the cost of family assistance to over $3.5 billion a year. The Heineman commission wants to do away entirely with food stamp and other surplus commodity programs, on the ground that directly distributing cash is a better way to combat poverty.

Heineman Plan's Appeal

The Heineman plan would provide a maximum payment of $2,400 a year to a family of four without outside income. The payments would be scaled down as outside earnings rose, being eliminated entirely at an income level of $4,800 a year.

The basic Nixon family assistance plan calls for a $1,600 a year maximum cash payment for a four-member family. However, the Administration also would povide free food stamps, under a formula calling for a combined cash-food stamp payment of $2,350 a year to a four-member family without outside income. The cash and food stamp benefit would be decreased in roughly similar fashion to the Heineman plan, but all payments would be cut off at $4,000 a year in outside income.

Daniel Moynihan, Presidential counsellor who helped design the Administration's welfare program, emphasized the similarities between the two plans at a White House press briefing. It's obvious, however, that the broader scope of the Heineman commission proposal, its stress on future expansion and a number of detailed differences will make it far more appealing to liberals on Capitol Hill.

Many Democrats have been criticizing the Nixon plan as too meager, too complex and potentially restrictive in its requirement that able-bodied welfare recipients seek jobs or enroll in work-training programs to receive their Federal assistance payments.

But the liberals are likely in the end to support the Nixon plan, even if it doesn't live up to their full desires. The reason: It's better than nothing and at least represents a substantial departure from the present, much criticized public assistance programs particularly Aid to Families with Dependent Children. Despite the sniping at the Nixon Administration by liberal political organizations and professional social welfare groups, their leaders will be hard pressed to publicly oppose the family assistance approach.

As one specific difference, the Heineman proposal dispenses with the work and training requirement. Staff director Robert Harris explained that the commission believed the incentive of receiving more money would be sufficient to encourage most poor persons to seek jobs. The commission also concluded that a work requirement couldn't be administered on an objective basis; it would inevitably require that welfare workers exert considerable discretion in deciding who should be forced to work or take training and who should be allowed to remain at home.

Elimination of a mandatory work requirement will please Congressional liberals. But it's certain to offend the conservatives who worry about people quitting work to live on welfare.

Capitol Leaders' Views

For one, Rep. Byrnes of Wisconsin, ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, is insisting that work restrictions be built into any new welfare program. The views of Chairman Mills (D., Ark.), most of which have so far been held close to his chest, will probably be the key element in shaping any new program that emerges from his committee.

But cost is certain to be an important consideration. The Administration has presented a total price tag of $4.4 billion a year in added Federal funds for its family-assistance plan, coupled with expansion in day care to help mothers of small children, and more work training programs.

The Heineman commission recommended other changes in Federal programs to help the poor, including improvements in manpower programs, more birth control services, and broader unemployment insurance coverage.

The total additional Federal outlays required for all its recommendations was $10 billion a year. But the commission insisted that even this sum "doesn't meet fully the obvious need." So it proposed that as rapidly as Federal finances permit, the welfare payment levels be increased from the $2,400 level .

The commission noted that setting the level at the poverty line of $3,550 for a four-member family would cost $27 billion a year in cash grants, hardly a sum that either Congress or the Administration is likely to be enthusiastic about.

Ecological Science Acquisitions

MIAMI — Ecological Science Corp. said it agreed to acquire two privately held companies for an undisclosed amount of its common stock, cash and notes.

One concern is Waste Heat Engineering Corp. for stock. Waste Heat, a Houston concern engaged in engineering, making and marketing sophisticated heat recovery equipment, has annual sales of about $3 million, Ecological Science said.

Ecological Science, an environmental control company, also agreed to acquire American Hydrotherm Corp. for cash, notes, and stock. American Hydrotherm, a New York designer and operator of sophisticated heating equipment, has annual sales of about $2 million, according to Ecological Science.

Social Security: Providing Basic Needs as a Legal Right

TO THE average American, "Social Security" is another way of saying "retirement." Upon hearing those words, most people think of the federal system into which both workers and employers contribute so the worker can have a monthly pension when he's too old to work.

The Social Security system that has been developing in this country during the past 34 years does mean that, but it also means much more than retirement benefits which workers receive, not as a matter of charity, but as a matter of right.

This program also means:

- Monthly benefits that provide for growing children and their mothers in the event that the family breadwinner dies while the children are still young.
- Monthly benefits for totally disabled workers and their families.
- A basic in-hospital program, plus an optional plan to help pay doctor and medical bills, for the nation's elderly citizens.

And this is not the full story. The Social Security system also provides:

- The basic machinery for administration of the federal-state unemployment insurance and workmen's compensation programs.
- Much-needed aid for aged persons, blind persons and dependent children.
- Help for those in need of maternal and child welfare, and public health assistance.

In other words, when Congress passed the Social Security Act in 1935, then signed into law by Pres. Franklin D. Roosevelt, it was setting American feet firmly on the path of social reform.

For the first time a law expressed the principle that American citizens were entitled to basic safeguards in time of need. But even though the law was new to the nation, the Constitution nearly two centuries ago had empowered the federal government to collect taxes and to "provide for the . . . general welfare."

A booklet giving analysis of the way these various elements of our Social Security operate has been prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security under the supervision of Director Bert Seidman.

What follows is the first of several articles adapted from the AFL-CIO booklet, which will be run from time to time in UNION NEWS. The series will contain the AFL-CIO's suggestions as to the steps that must now be taken to improve the Social Security system.

Franklin Roosevelt put it well when, in signing the legislation into law, he referred to it as "the cornerstone of a structure which is being built — but is by no means complete."

Old Age, Survivors, Disability and Health Insurance

The Social Security Act of 1935 established an insurance program — one that was based on a very simple concept. Like any insurance, social insurance averages the cost of the risk among the group covered — costs that would be too much for any one individual to bear.

Unlike private insurance, almost universal coverage is assured by auto-for Social Security. Now 90 percent are eligible.

Benefits Aid Economy

The favorable impact of the Social Security system on the American economy is considerable. It pays out more than $2 billion in benefits each month to 24 million Americans.

SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS ARE BELOW POVERTY LEVEL
1968 Average

1968, the full-time earnings of a worker at the minimum level reached $3,200 — assuming, of course, that he was employed year-round.

This is nearly three times the average Social Security benefit of the single retired worker, and more than 60 percent higher than the average benefit of a retired couple.

A False Assumption

Increasingly the claim is made that if the Social Security law were repealed, and if an individual regularly invested the amount of his Social Security contribution, he would be able to purchase a private insurance annuity that would provide a greater retirement allowance.

This is a totally false assumption. For one thing, it totally ignores the employer's contribution, which is now paid into the Social Security system as a matter of law. For another, it ignores the experience with private pension systems which clearly shows that tens of millions of workers could not find the way to purchase annuities, or to save regularly, were it not for the Social Security system which deducts the the sole source of funding will have to be modified.

A government contribution for Social Security is common practice in many nations. It has long been thought of for this country — as far back as 1934 the group which did the development work for the original Social Security law favored some financing from general revenue. Social Security advisory councils since that time have made similar recommendations.

There are good reasons to justify financing at least part of the cost of the program from general revenues. One is the savings in welfare costs that have flowed directly from the establishment of the Social Security system.

For example, since 1950, the percentage of the older population receiving welfare payments through old-age assistance has decreased from 23 percent to 11 percent — a reduction of one-half.

Even though savings in welfare costs would help substantially to meet the cost of a government contribution, it is not just a matter of money. It is a matter of dignity and self-respect of Social Security recipients, who receive adequate Social Security benefits as a matter of right.

This program also means:

- Monthly benefits that provide for growing children and their mothers in the event that the family breadwinner dies while the children are still young.

- Monthly benefits for totally disabled workers and their families.

- A basic in-hospital program, plus an optional plan to help pay doctor and medical bills, for the nation's elderly citizens.

Old Age, Survivors, Disability and Health Insurance

The Social Security Act of 1935 established an insurance program — one that was based on a very simple concept. Like any insurance, social insurance averages the cost of the risk among the group covered — costs that would be too much for any one individual to bear.

Unlike private insurance, almost universal coverage is assured by automatically making a worker eligible, simply by reason of his employment. During his working life the employe contributes part of his pay to a fund, with the employer making a matching contribution.

When the individual becomes unable to work because of age, disability, or if he dies, he or his dependents or survivors receive cash benefits. When he and his wife (or his widow) incur certain medical expenses after age 65, they receive medical benefits.

The program covers the worker wherever he moves in the United States. It is a contributory system through which he can help pay for his own social insurance protection and that of his family. Benefits are paid as a legal right and the worker does not have to plead poverty in order to receive them.

As originally passed Social Security provided only retirement benefits for workers. Now it also provides continuing income for the family after the loss of the breadwinner's earnings through disability or death. In July 1966 it began to provide an added cushion against the impact of ill health in old age.

In 1950 only about one-fourth of the population aged 65 and over were eligible for Social Security. Now 90 percent are eligible.

PERSONS RECEIVING SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

In Millions—1968

Benefits Aid Economy

The favorable impact of the Social Security system on the American economy is considerable. It pays out more than $2 billion in benefits each month to 24 million Americans.

It provides protection against the cost of hospitalization and related care for more than 19.5 million and almost all retired persons over 65. The benefit figures include retirement benefits for 15.9 million workers and their dependents; survivor's benefits to 5.8 million widows and orphans; disability benefits to nearly 2.3 million disabled workers and their dependents. More than 18 million aged persons have medical insurance protection.

Here's another way to measure Social Security benefits:

- Some 9 out of 10 people age 65 and over are drawing benefits or are eligible for benefits under the program.

- About 19 out of every 20 young children and their mothers can count on monthly benefits if the family breadwinner dies.

- About 67 million people under age 65 are insured in the event of severe disability.

Clearly, then, the Old Age, Survivors, Disability and Health Insurance program plays a key role in providing economic security for millions of Americans. It is a program that preserves human dignity.

But despite the progress there are still major problems.

The Social Security Administration estimates that about 5.4 million persons age 65 and over are living in poverty, and that another 6.7 million are kept out of poverty only by their Social Security benefits.

A government survey in 1962 found that more than 50 percent of the aged couples had incomes of less than $3,000, and that 29 percent had incomes of less than $2,000.

The Labor Dept. sets its level for adequate living for an elderly couple at about $3,869 a year in an urban area, and $3,460 in a smaller community.

When the $1.60 an hour federal minimum wage became effective in February 1968, the full-time earnings of a worker at the minimum level reached $3,200 — assuming, of course, that he was employed year-round.

This is nearly three times the average Social Security benefit of the single retired worker, and more than 60 percent higher than the average benefit of a retired couple.

A False Assumption

Increasingly the claim is made that if the Social Security law were repealed, and if an individual regularly invested the amount of his Social Security contribution, he would be able to purchase a private insurance annuity that would provide a greater retirement allowance.

This is a totally false assumption. For one thing, it totally ignores the employer's contribution, which is now paid into the Social Security system as a matter of law. For another, it ignores the experience with private pension systems which clearly shows that tens of millions of workers could not find the way to purchase annuities, or to save regularly, were it not for the Social Security system which deducts the amount from each paycheck.

Those who favor elimination of Social Security focus exclusively on the retirement benefit. But the system provides more than that. It also includes lump-sum death benefits, survivors' benefits, disability benefits, and hospital and related health benefits — and all of these have considerable value.

It is estimated, for example, assuming an average monthly wage of $550 (the median earnings of regularly employed men), and using standard life expectancies, that a worker who dies at age 35 leaving a 32-year-old mother with two children, age 3 and 5, would have survivors' insurance protection valued at over $56,000.

If the same worker became disabled and died five years later, the value of the benefits payable exceeds $59,000. If the same worker retires at age 65 without becoming disabled, he and his wife (age 55) would have retirement insurance protection worth nearly $38,000.

These amounts are understated since they are based on existing benefits. Increases are bound to take place so that the actual amounts received would be considerably higher. Moreover, the benefits payable under Medicare must be added to all of these in order to get a true picture of the value of Social Security.

Tax Limit Approaching

An increasing number of low-income families are paying more in Social Security taxes than in income taxes. For example, a man with a wife and two children, earning from $2,000 to $3,000 a year pays no income tax — yet he pays between $96 and $144 in Social Security taxes. Not until he reaches about $4,500 a year does he pay more income tax than Social Security tax.

The point is fast approaching where it will be difficult to increase the Social Security tax rate for low-paid workers. The principle that payroll taxes shall be the sole source of funding will have to be modified.

A government contribution for Social Security is common practice in many nations. It has long been thought of for this country — as far back as 1934 the group which did the development work for the original Social Security law favored some financing from general revenue. Social Security advisory councils since that time have made similar recommendations.

There are good reasons to justify financing at least part of the cost of the program from general revenues. One is the savings in welfare costs that have flowed directly from the establishment of the Social Security system.

Even though savings in welfare costs would help substantially to meet the cost of a government contribution, it is not just a matter of money. It is a matter of dignity and self-respect of Social Security recipients, who receive adequate Social Security benefits as a matter of right.

Many Americans think the Social Security system is adequate today because of the great improvements made in the law in the past 30 years — the addition of survivor, disability and medical care benefits and the greatly increased retirement benefits.

Behind Other Nations

But despite these gains, the United States uses less of its national wealth for the social welfare of its citizens than other advanced industrial nations. The U.S. ranks below every free nation in Europe in the percentage of national income devoted to social benefits. (See chart below.)

If Social Security benefits were increased 50 percent, the average single retiree's benefit would still be only $1,764 a year, and elderly couples would receive only about $2,970.

Welfare (or Guaranteed Income)

We've Come a Long Way, But . . .

Among the Poor, Only 1 in 4 Receives Public Assistance

Editor's note: One of the most commonly heard criticisms of welfare programs is that "handouts are given out to those people who are too lazy to work." "Why don't they get a job?" the complaint goes. "Why, I'd do anything — even scrub floors on my hands and knees — before I'd accept welfare."

That is the thinking of a great number of Americans — who usually are white, middle class and steadily employed. On this subject, they are the not-so-silent majority. And they couldn't be more off base.

For most people on welfare are not there by choice, or because they are "too lazy to work." In fact, all but a small handful of welfare recipients are unable to work. They are either too old to work or they are disabled, or they are blind, or they are children, or they are mothers caring for those children.

Following is the second in a series of articles on Social Security adapted from an AFL-CIO booklet, "Security in Time of Need," which tells of provisions in the Social Security Act for federal contributions to inadequate state public welfare programs.

THE public welfare system in the United States took a long time to grow — and when it did begin, its growth was gradual and uneven.

It had its start in the early days of the republic, when Congress used part of the revenues raised from general taxation to pay pensions of disabled veterans of the Revolutionary War, and for a maritime hospital to care for merchant seamen.

Its growth accelerated somewhat during the industrial revolution for, in the shift from a rural to an urban society, way. But measured against the problem that still exists, these statistics show the total inadequacy of public assistance efforts.

Less than one-quarter of the poor in America receive public assistance. In nearly all states public welfare payments fail to bring the incomes of the poor who do receive them up to poverty levels.

Public welfare programs throughout the country are so financially starved of needed funds that they can provide only sub-minimum maintenance and inadequate social service to a mere 22 percent of the poorest and most underprivileged members of our society — including mothers caring for fatherless children, the most poverty-stricken among the elderly, and the neediest of the disabled and blind.

THESE stark facts measure the inadequacy of public welfare — yet even they do not tell the whole story. For, contrary to the allegations of those who would slash public welfare programs, most needy people get no public assistance at all.

Why? Because less than half the poor fall into the artificial categories of public assistance that have been established — the needy aged, the blind, the permanently and totally disabled, and certain needy families with dependent children.

In addition, some, but not all, states finance general assistance programs for which there is no federal aid. The reason why so few poor people get assistance is because:

- There are gaps in the categories of needy people for whom federally aided public assistance is available.
- Some states are either financially

It is certainly not in the national interest to put people in jobs paying below a minimum wage, or to take mothers of young children out of the home until adequate child care provisions have been made. The problems resulting from having small children move into an already crowded home of a neighbor for day care while their mother is in training or at work could be costly in both dollars and human terms.

IF THE serious intent is to provide the means by which people take care of their own needs and also contribute to society, then the AFL-CIO believes that the following must be done:

Begin working toward the objectives

even scrub floors on my hands and knees — before I'd accept welfare."

That is the thinking of a great number of Americans — who usually are white, middle class and steadily employed. On this subject, they are the not-so-silent majority. And they couldn't be more off base.

For most people on welfare are not there by choice, or because they are "too lazy to work." In fact, all but a small handful of welfare recipients are unable to work. They are either too old to work or they are disabled, or they are blind, or they are children, or they are mothers caring for those children.

Following is the second in a series of articles on Social Security adapted from an AFL-CIO booklet, "Security in Time of Need," which tells of provisions in the Social Security Act for federal contributions to inadequate state public welfare programs.

THE public welfare system in the United States took a long time to grow — and when it did begin, its growth was gradual and uneven.

It had its start in the early days of the republic, when Congress used part of the revenues raised from general taxation to pay pensions of disabled veterans of the Revolutionary War, and for a maritime hospital to care for merchant seamen.

Its growth accelerated somewhat during the industrial revolution for, in the shift from a rural to an urban society, people faced staggering economic problems resulting from unemployment, disability and death — problems that had no parallel on the farm.

The frontiers of social conscience began to expand in the latter half of the 19th Century, when some states established homes for the mentally ill and later for dependent children, the blind, the deaf and the aged.

Legislative activity increased in some of the states early in the 20th Century, at which time cash assistance was provided to certain categories among the poor.

Laws making it possible for orphans and other children without support from their fathers to live at home with their mothers, rather than in institutions, were adopted in a number of states prior to World War I. In the mid-Twenties, a few states began to experiment with old-age assistance and aid to the blind.

But, in general, these public assistance programs lagged far behind the need, and when Congress enacted the Social Security Act of 1935, it included in it basic provisions for shoring up the inadequate state programs.

Federal grants are now provided to the states for financial assistance, medical care and other services to the aged, the blind, totally disabled persons, and children in low-income families when they are unable to meet either basic needs or such special needs as medical care.

Those who receive federally assisted welfare — 8,680,000 — are virtually all handicapped by age, physical condition, education, training or family circumstances. More than 2 million are over 65; a half million are totally disabled; some 100,000 are blind; more than 3 million are children; about 1 million are adults caring for these children.

On the surface the statistics on those helped through public assistance programs may seem impressive. When measured against what this country has done — or has failed to do — in the past, it can be said that we've come a long America receive public assistance. In nearly all states public welfare payments fail to bring the incomes of the poor who do receive them up to poverty levels.

Public welfare programs throughout the country are so financially starved of needed funds that they can provide only sub-minimum maintenance and inadequate social service to a mere 22 percent of the poorest and most underprivileged members of our society — including mothers caring for fatherless children, the most poverty-stricken among the elderly, and the neediest of the disabled and blind.

THESE stark facts measure the inadequacy of public welfare — yet even they do not tell the whole story. For, contrary to the allegations of those who would slash public welfare programs, most needy people get no public assistance at all.

Why? Because less than half the poor fall into the artificial categories of public assistance that have been established — the needy aged, the blind, the permanently and totally disabled, and certain needy families with dependent children.

In addition, some, but not all, states finance general assistance programs for which there is no federal aid. The reason why so few poor people get assistance is because:

- There are gaps in the categories of needy people for whom federally aided public assistance is available.
- Some states are either financially unable or unwilling to participate in all of the available federal programs.
- Some states provide limitations and restrictions not required by federal law.
- Assistance standards in some states are so low as to exclude many persons who are below the state's own minimum-need standards, and far below the poverty level.

Many people do not fit into restrictive categories. The result is that among the poor who get no help from federally aided public assistance programs are most needy adults under age 65 who are unemployed or unable to earn an adequate living; most needy children living with both parents; needy disabled adults who are not both permanently and totally disabled; many children in need because of the unemployment of a parent; needy persons who have not lived in a state for a specified period; needy employable mothers for whom no jobs are available; and persons with defective vision but not blind enough to qualify for assistance.

Public assistance payments are extremely low. In every instance they are far below poverty levels. The lowest average payment for aid to families with dependent children is Mississippi's $8.50 per recipient; the highest is New York's $62.70; the national average is $41.35.

THE inadequacy of public assistance cannot be challenged. But despite this fact, costs have been increasing. It should be emphasized, however, that this is true only in absolute terms — for public assistance costs, as a proportion of the gross national product, have been declining.

The dollar increase in public assistance costs can be attributed to:

- Rising, though still inadequate, payments which in most cases have not even kept pace with the increasing cost of living.
- Larger than average increases in the numbers of very young and very old people — the two most dependent groups in our society.

- Inadequate Social Security benefits, which have forced a considerable number of people on Social Security to seek public assistance to supplement their benefits and thus meet minimum needs.
- Inadequate guidance, training and rehabilitation programs and insufficient work opportunity to permit ultimately employable public assistance recipients to obtain the jobs they might fill.

It should be recognized, however, that most people receiving public assistance — including large numbers of the elderly, the disabled and mothers with young children — either could not, or should not, work full time even if they were able to obtain suitable jobs.

ACTING under legislation passed two years earlier, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare in 1964 appointed a 12-member Advisory Council on Public Welfare. The council's mandate from Congress was to review the nation's public assistance programs. After two years of inquiry, which included public hearings in every section of the country, the council made its report in June 1966.

This group — broadly representative of all citizens deeply concerned about the poor and their problems — recommended a new approach to public welfare. The highlights of its recommendations were these:

- A national minimum standard for public assistance payments, below which no state may fall.
- A national comprehensive system of public assistance based on a single criterion: Need.
- A uniform, simple plan for federal-state sharing in the costs of all public welfare programs — one which provides for equitable and reasonable fiscal effort on the part of the states, and which also recognizes the relative fiscal capacities of federal and state governments.
- Comprehensive social services readily accessible, as a matter of right, at all times to all in need.
- A principle that all welfare programs receiving federal funds be administered in a way that would be consistent with the concept that the right of the individual must be safeguarded at all times.

The view of the AFL-CIO is that these objectives should be reached as soon as possible.

WHILE Congress was increasing and extending Social Security benefits in 1967, it also enacted harsh, new restrictions on poor mothers and children receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC).

Congress then set up a program requiring that mothers on AFDC accept work or training, or lose public support for their children. The AFL-CIO strongly supports any program which, in fact, provides job opportunities to the employed.

However, experience has clearly shown that if a program is to be at all meaningful and effective it must be developed gradually and carefully and be responsive to all aspects of the problem it is set up to deal with.

It is certainly not in the national interest to put people in jobs paying below a minimum wage, or to take mothers of young children out of the home until adequate child care provisions have been made. The problems resulting from having small children move into an already crowded home of a neighbor for day care while their mother is in training or at work could be costly in both dollars and human terms.

IF THE serious intent is to provide the means by which people take care of their own needs and also contribute to society, then the AFL-CIO believes that the following must be done:

Begin working toward the objectives of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare as listed above; establish good day-care centers where working mothers may leave their children; establish training programs that lead to real jobs which pay at least the minimum wage, and eliminate the "freeze" which sharply restricts the number of children from broken homes who have been eligible to receive assistance since July 1, 1969.

In addition to the steps outlined by the Advisory Council on Public Welfare, the following improvements, in the opinion of the AFL-CIO, are urgently needed:

- The federal government should make it mandatory that all states provide AFDC to families with a jobless father in the home, while maintaining the requirement for fathers to accept suitable employment or training. This would eliminate the cruel dilemma in many states which forces fathers to leave their families to make them eligible for assistance.
- Minimum standards should be required in housing occupied by public welfare recipients, the rents of which are being paid out of public funds. It is inconceivable that public welfare should, in effect, be used to subsidize slum housing.
- Aid to the permanently and totally disabled should be improved by including the relatively short-term disabled, recognizing partial disability which is seriously incapacitating, and eliminating the present minimum age of 18.
- Where they still exist detailed demeaning investigations of public assistance applicants and recipients should be eliminated in favor of less costly and more democratic methods of determining eligibility. These methods should be consistent with constitutional and statutory rights, and should not violate the privacy or dignity of individuals seeking assistance.
- Child welfare programs should be extended and improved. Better services are needed for care and protection of children — including foster care and day care.

Va. Welfare Cutback Suggested to Aid Farm Labor Pool

By Tom Wilkinson
Washington Post Staff Writer

RICHMOND, June 4—A Virginia study commission suggested today the curtailment of some existing unemployment assistance programs as a way of increasing the labor pool available for State agriculture.

The commission also suggested that Federal regulations on the housing of seasonal workers require housing that is too costly.

The recommendations were two of many contained in a 100-page report submitted to Gov. Mills E. Godwin by the Commission of the Industry of Agriculture. In general, the commission pictured agriculture in Virginia as healthy and growing, but admitted the existence of some problems.

S. Mason Carbaugh, executive director of the study group, said the commission had no specific recommendations for trimming or eliminating any particular unemployment or welfare program.

"A number of people felt that some of these programs don't encourage able-bodied men to work. They felt many would work if the programs were not available to them," commented Carbaugh.

No recommendations for program cuts will be forthcoming, said the executive director, noting the strictly advisory nature of the commission. He expressed the hope that the commission's recommendation would force recognition of the problem.

The commission's report, two years in the making, also suggested the modification of the "red tape" involved in employing 14- to 16-year-olds in agriculture. Carbaugh said the intent of that recommendation was to increase the number and types of jobs that persons in the age group could legally perform.

Another labor recommendation is to modify Federal regulations governing the housing of seasonal workers. Carbaugh said it is "extremely costly to provide the type of housing required by Federal standards" and indicated the commission preferred broader housing regulations.

Statistics compiled by the commission showed 340,000 people employed in agriculture in Virginia, and the report predicted the farm labor force would be reduced by 40 per cent by 1980.

The traditional family farm is disappearing the commission reported. It indicated the majority of small farms would have to consolidate and introduce modern business methods if they hoped to survive.

The total retail value of State agricultural products was set at $3 billion in 1968 and is expected to reach $4.1 billion by 1980, said the report. Gross farm income is expected to climb from $568 million to $891 million.

Nixon Aims to Switch Emphasis in Welfare From Aged to Children

Spending Expected to Jump After the War; Education, Health Programs Planned But the Elderly Have Clout

Wall St. Journal 6/10/69

By JONATHAN SPIVAK
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—The Nixon Administration is embarking on a determined but politically difficult campaign to shift the Federal welfare focus from aiding the aged to caring for kids.

The basic concept: Tax dollars can be better spent preventing educational and health handicaps in children—particularly poor children—than treating such disabilities later in life.

"The President is deadly serious about this—a national commitment to the first five years of life. He wants to make this a central theme of this Administration," declares a high-ranking White House official.

As one result, the President already has ruled out reductions in programs for children in the current round of anti-inflation belt-tightening. But the broader impact is envisioned when the Vietnam war ends, permitting expansion of domestic programs. The Administration's expressed objective is gradually to funnel a steadily larger share of ever-growing Federal revenues to youngsters, though not disregarding the needs of the aged.

Higher HEW Outlays

Such an approach could require a significant increase in outlays by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, whose budget for the coming fiscal year totals $50.5 billion even after a downward revision by the Nixon Administration. Says HEW Secretary Robert Finch: "I'd like to see a great chunk of resources put in at the lower end of the age spectrum and hold (spending) at the top end."

The obstacles are substantial. Congress' approval would be required for such a reordering of priorities, and the old folks exert immense influence there. The AFL-CIO and senior citizens' organizations are active lobbyists for the aged. Voting clout aside, many lawmakers feel sincere concern for the plight of the typical senior citizen.

Other well-established social welfare programs also have powerful constituencies who could feel short-changed by a new concentration on children ("It implies writing off the present generation" a planner in the poverty war complains). Finally, although a Federal campaign for children could have wide popular appeal, its major beneficiaries at least at the start would likely be Negro children and jobless parents. Thus, conservative forces in the Cabinet and in the Republican Party might prevail on the President to moderate the change.

Finally, although a Federal campaign for children could have wide popular appeal, its major beneficiaries at least at the start would likely be Negro children and jobless parents. Thus, conservative forces in the Cabinet and in the Republican Party might prevail on the President to moderate the change.

Proposed Policies

Whatever the difficulties, here are some of the youth-oriented policies the Nixon Administration will probably attempt to pursue:

—Enlargement of cash payments for needy children, either through a guaranteed annual family income, as favored by Secretary Finch, or a more conventional bolstering of existing public welfare programs. In any case, the emphasis will be on aiding poverty-stricken parents, in the hope that more Federal money will hold families together and enable adults to provide more adequately for their children. The sharpest increases would occur in the South, where welfare payments for children now are the lowest.

—Restraints on increases in Social Security payments. Many Nixon Administration officials question the need for regularly raising these retirement benefits every few years. Mr. Nixon has called for a 7% rise in Social Security outlays next year, sufficient only to cover cost-of-living increases since February 1968, in contrast to the 10% boost proposed by the Johnson Administration.

—Expansion of health care programs for mothers and children, in hopes of preventing costly medical problems by early treatment. For example, HEW's high command will enthusiastically underwrite free immunization campaigns with a new German measles vaccine soon to be available, in an effort to curtail crippling birth defects from that disease. More broadly, the long-range goal would be to expand comprehensive maternal care for all poverty-stricken mothers. Now only about 125,000, or less than 20%, receive such Federally financed help.

—More spending for family-planning services, particularly information about contraception, so that an impoverished mother could avoid too-frequent child-bearing and the accompanying risk of birth defects, while lightening the economic load on her family. In the coming year, an estimated $67 million will be spent on family-planning aid for about 1.3 million women. To reach all five million poor women of child-bearing age would cost about $90 million more annually, experts estimate.

—Enlargement of day-care programs, not only to enable mothers to work but to educate and otherwise help their young children. Present Federal services reach about 45,000 children at a cost of $27 million annually; communities already are being encouraged to pool day-care funds from various Government agencies, with the aim of making the service more effective and more comprehensive.

—Improvement of preschool education efforts, particularly Head Start. Recent studies find youngsters without Head Start doing as well academically as those who participated, and the experts' conclusion is that even earlier and more sustained "intervention" in the life of the impoverished child is essential to prevent lifelong learning disabilities. Thus, preschooling will be provided, at least experimentally, to children under age three; more followup services will be furnished to Head Start graduates through their early grade-school years, and the search for ways to stimulate infant intelligence will be intensified.

It would be misleading to suggest that a sudden shift in Federal spending from the aged to the very young is imminent. The Administration's intent is a gradual expansion of programs for kids while holding down increases in expenditures on the aged. However, it's likely that the old folks will get the lion's share of Federal social welfare expenditures for many years to come.

In the fiscal year starting July 1, Uncle Sam will spend an estimated $35 billion (much of it in Social Security benefits) on the 20 million Americans 65 and older, or $1,750 per capita. In contrast, $15 billion is earmarked for the 81.5 million Americans under 21, or $190 per capita (for the aged, per-capita outlays for health care alone will be more than double this amount).

The imbalance has diminished somewhat in the last decade, as the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations sought to emphasize programs for children as part of their push against poverty. But the new Administration may find it difficult to depart further from the traditional priority for the aged. One reason is that doling out more cash to old folks is automatically achieved through Social Security and Medicare benefits. "It is easier to write bigger Social Security checks for the aged; it is much harder to deliver better educational services to children," observes a Budget Bureau expert.

Potential Problems

Some of the Administration's specific ideas could provoke criticism, too. Welfare experts worry about big day-care centers providing nothing more than baby-sitting, ignoring the children's educational needs. Conservatives on Capitol Hill could attack increasing Federal involvement in family affairs and infant training. Militant Negroes might claim that expansion of Federal birth control programs is amied at reducing the black population.

The most fundamental uncertainty of all centers on the new Administration's willingness to expand spending on social programs. All signs now point to substantial post-Vietnam increases in Federal domestic outlays, but other demands could interfere—military needs for new equipment, public pressure for tax relief, state insistence on revenue-sharing.

Nonetheless, the Finch forces appear firmly committed to expanding early-childhood programs. "When you start talking about breaking the poverty cycle . . . the emphasis has to be on the child and changing his attitude and environment, and I don't think you can start too young in that respect," declares John Veneman, HEW Under Secretary and a key Finch confidant.

A new office of child development has just been established to give impetus to HEW's programs for children. Supervised by Assistant HEW Secretary James Farmer, the veteran civil rights leader, the office's first challenge will be to remedy the shortcomings of the $338-million-a-year Head Start program, which now enrolls more than 700,000 kids annually in full-year or summer programs. The President is shifting Head Start out of the Office of Economic Opportunity as of July 1.

Sharing Prosperity— Income Policy Choices

by Elizabeth Wickenden

The role of work in the modern society is central to any income policy discussion. Popular attitudes place the highest value on work not only as the basis for income, but also for self and community esteem. Most of the current self-help efforts of the poverty program are directed toward fitting the poor to work and creating new job opportunities for that purpose. Yet some writers maintain that cybernation is already making obsolescent this traditional nexus between work and income. They look to the day when every individual or family would be paid a stipend as consumer, somewhat in the tradition of the Townsend old age pension plan. To my mind, this makes much better sense than the complexities of a largescale, all-purpose program based on income deficiency.

But this dream of lying under the cybernetic breadfruit tree has its setting in an unpredictable future. At the present time, it is consistent neither with technological realities nor most people's wishes. It seems an absurdity to talk about work as obsolescent when we have not enough houses, schools, hospitals, cultural centers, parks and playgrounds; when we lack teachers, nurses, librarians, social workers, youth leaders, day care for children, social centers for the aged, homemakers for the ill and handicapped, doctors, lawyers, merchants, chiefs; when our streams and our air are polluted, our parks neglected, our highways and airways corrupted by commercialism and our choices for enriching our spare time similarly constricted. And all this leaves out the desperate needs of the rest of the world for our food, our machinery, our scientific know-how, our support for the instruments of cooperation.

I do not think everyone should have to work or work so long and so hard as many do at present. Considering that we are all born dependent, die dependent and spend varying periods of our life dependent, our fear and rejection of "dependency" is somewhat

ELIZABETH WICKENDEN is a policy consultant to the National Assembly on Social Policy and Development and to the New York University Law School project on social welfare law. She teaches policy planning at the Hunter College School of Planning. absurd. But for the moment work still offers for most people the most satisfying sense of identity and achievement, the most acceptable source of current and deferred income. Most people are quite willing and conditioned by habit to spending their money for benefits derived from the work of others. But they need to place as high a valuation on direct services as they do the products of labor and as high a valuation on services financed by taxes as on those purchased in the marketplace. For the more mechanical become our processes for producing things, the more we can free our energies for the fundamental human task of mutual service. And as Kenneth Galbraith points out in "The Affuent Society," a large proportion of these services lie in the public sector.

A Guaranteed Job

I feel that the government should guarantee a job at standard wages to everyone willing and able to work, should pioneer in the development of new kinds of work for persons of all ages and backgrounds, should subsidize retraining and relocation for all those displaced by economic change, should facilitate work for those with family responsibilities through social services such as day care and visiting nurse service, should treat education at the higher levels as compensable work, should place a value on work in the home (the Chase Manhattan Bank recently evaluated the average housewife's labor at over $8,000 a year), and should extend expanded social insurance protections to all these categories.

The idea of a guaranteed job, implicit in the Employment Act of 1946 though never implemented, seems revolutionary to many laissez-faire advocates who see in the labor reserve a necessary goad to industry and effort. But in 1906, Beatrice Webb noted in her diary a speech by Winston Churchill advocating a minimal guarantee of income with the state as a "reserve employer of labor." It is evidently not ideas and proposals that are lacking, nor even in our time the means—but rather the will to implement them.

Work-Related Insurance

Work is not only the most generally accepted basis for money transfers in the form of wage or purchase payments, but also seems in our present state of social development to offer the most generally acceptable basis for deferred payments when earnings are interrupted by such general hazards as old age, retirement, disability and premature death and transitional unemployment. Insurance systems in other countries cover additional risks such as health costs, wage losses due to sickness and maternity and the economic costs of child-rearing. The rapid growth in coverage, the addition of new benefits and a high degree of popular acceptability for our own federal Old Age, Survivors, Disability and Health Insurance program result—in my opinion—from three interrelated factors: its work-related basis for entitlement, the sense of identification between worker as contributor and worker as beneficiary and the fact of self-contained financing outside the annual appropriating process. The modifications which have either taken place or been proposed in each of these principles deserve the most careful evaluation if the system is to be preserved and strengthened.

Social insurance has come under intensive review and some criticism in the current reappraisal. Many of the criticisms are inconsistent. Some complain that the system is not sufficiently redistributive while others complain that people do not take out precisely what they put in. (They seem to visualize a little bag of gold in Fort Knox with their name on it, more like a savings account than an insurance policy.) Some complain that the payroll tax on workers is regressive while that on employers inhibits employment by raising costs. Others make the sophistical error of combining public assistance and social insurance payments and then criticizing the payments going to the non-needy as if all were intended for that purpose. Some favor universal pension-type coverage of the aged (currently incorporated on a transitional basis in medicare and the so-called Prouty amendment minimal payments to those without social insurance credits under governmental program) and some favor optional coverage for the individual.

But most people accept social insurance as a deferred return on labor, a "right" cemented by their own contributions unrelated to their current need. Its role in relationship to poverty is preventive, not alleviative, and any move toward an income-related entitlement would destroy its essential value.

Its principal limitation as a poverty preventive at the present time is the inadequate level of its benefits which have not kept pace with the rise in earnings levels. Many advocates feel that benefit levels should be at least doubled with a general revenue sharing in the cost of this increase. It is their belief that general revenue could help to carry the social costs of the system (initiating costs, weighted benefits for low earners and dependents' allowances) as in other countries without endangering the principle of earned entitlement.

Tax-Supported Services

It is the thrust of this discussion that the need for income deficiency benefits should be reduced to a minimum by methods and programs more consistent with American values, attitudes and willingness to pay. But money payments related to work are only one such method. Another is the provision of tax-supported services and benefits to the public generally or specified groups in the population. Education, health benefits, subsidized housing, child care services, recreational and cultural provisions all provide real income, replace private expenditures for the same purposes and help to prevent at least some of the causes and by-products of poverty. Again the question arises as to whether it is better policy to concentrate resources available for this purpose on the needs of those who are least able to purchase them (the poor) or whether a more democratic, less divisive and hence more acceptable pattern lies in universality. The former assumes limited resources and compensatory concentration for a transitional period but runs the risk of ultimate segregation by income class and the danger of second-rate services for the poor.

A second question involves the relationship of disposable personal income to tax-supported services. American tradition has tended to an over-evaluation of the former at the expense of the latter but there is also a danger in further distinguishing the poor from the affluent by restrictive benefits. The current recipient revolt against the limitations of the stamp plan for subsidized food purchases reflects the high valuation which people place on the freedom, convertibility and anonymity of cash income. Without an adequate income policy it is virtually impossible to evaluate the intrinsic utility of such compensatory measures.

Public services also constitute the arena for a peculiarly interesting crosscurrent in American attitudes today. This is the pressure for individuals grouped together as consumers of public services—whether around geographical neighborhoods or particular institutions such as schools, housing projects, social service centers, etc.—to control or influence the character of these services. Again, the poverty program through its emphasis on "maximum feasible participation of the poor" in community action undertakings has been a major catalytic agent in accelerating this decentralizing process.

It is interesting to observe that while pressures for income payments have been largely directed toward more centralization (on the assumption that higher standards and more objective entitlement would lie in nationwide control), the reaction to centralized bureaucracy has largely centered on neighborhood social services—not excluding the services of lawyers to strengthen the hand of consumers vis-à-vis the political and economic bureaucracies. While the poverty program has tended to focus this effort on the poor, the true common denominator is the consumer. Thus we need to cultivate new forms of consumer-dominated cooperation in providing wanted social services as an offset to the limitations of governmental monopoly.

Another frequently discussed alternative to income deficiency payments involves benefits related to age or condition without regard to prior work history or individual need. Family allowances, old age pensions and disability pensions fall in this category. It is my belief that these are all historical anachronisms that would do little to enlist the support so necessary to a more effective income policy. Family limitation through contraceptive aids is now replacing subsidized family expansion as a primary goal of social policy.

Moreover, countries like the United Kingdom and France with longstanding family allowance plans are finding it difficult to channel more money to the most desperately needy families in the face of pressures to raise the universal benefits. Old age pensions would tend to settle at the lowest level of the present retirement benefit scale unless supplemented by payments related to earnings or need, in which case they would lose their basic simplicity. Rehabilitation and facilitated employment have replaced subsidized idleness as the remedy of choice for the disabled. Thus these options of yesteryear seem to me to offer little practical hope for future development.

Income Deficiency Payments

So finally I return once again to income deficiency benefits, residuary legatee of the nation's income policy. It seems obvious that no system based on work-related benefits and universal public services can meet all needs. Some people, either because of physical or emotional disabilities, are never connected with the workforce. Universally available health, mental health, rehabilitative, training and specialized institutional services might meet the need for many of these and each of these services might well carry its own provisions for cash income needs (as, for example, is now the case with the MDTA program). Some risks, most notably that of children deprived of parental support because of desertion before or after birth do not seem to lend themselves to the risk-sharing concept of social insurance. Essentially this is a child welfare problem and is discussed in that context. But more persuasively, some needs are so great, so temporary or so unusual that they require an individualized approach.

Most of the present differences of viewpoint that surround an appropriate method for providing ultimate underpinning protection against these needs seem to be either related to emphasis or administrative method.

On the first score, there are those who feel our primary emphasis in income policy should center on minimal guarantees with some going so far as to see these as replacing all those measures, like social insurance, directed to the prevention of poverty before it occurs. To my mind this is both defeatist in the sense that it presupposes the impossibility or undesirability of preventing poverty (it is a simple fact of logic that one cannot prevent poverty by measures conditioned on its prior existence) and dangerous in subjecting the impoverished minority to all the isolating, denigrating pressures previously discussed. But a national income policy that sets its sights on the prevention of poverty and alienation does not reduce the obligation to provide protective, alleviative and restorative measures on a basis of decency and dignity when they occur. It is simply that we cannot afford to risk the destruction or weakening of preventive measures by an ill-conceived emphasis on alleviative measures which carry such a seductive allure of economy to the rest of society.

Administrative Questions

On the administrative side, I see three interrelated questions: (1) Should a program of minimal income guarantees be federally-administered or should it be continued under some modification of the existing federal-state pattern? (2) Should it be administered by a tax-controlling agency as a reverse aspect of the redistributive function of taxation? and (3) Should the granting of cash income be totally divorced from the giving of individualized social service?

Advisory Council Recommendations

As a member of the Advisory Council on Public Welfare appointed under the authority of the 1962 Public Welfare Amendments, my own views are largely reflected in the recommendations of that Council. It is the general thesis of its report that a radically different pattern of federal financing could assure a federally-determined nationwide minimum standard under state administration and that this standard should incorporate both income guarantees for all needy and essential social services for all who want and need them. The term Basic Social Guarantee is applied to this combined approach.

The Council's recommendations are predicated on the assumption that a primary goal is the reduction of the incidence of income deficiency by all the measures herein described or any others yet to be devised. It is on this assumption that it sees the task of providing residual minimal income guarantees as being closely related to the provision of a vastly expanded range of social services. The family head suddenly confronted with catastrophic needs, the deserted mother of several young children, the elderly couple stricken by illness or failure of competence on the part of one partner, the victim of fire or other emergency (to name just a few examples) cannot afford the time or energy to run from one agency to another. He needs a single source of help, hopefully available in his own neighborhood. He doesn't need an internal revenue agent or an income based on his past year's deficiency but immediate help which is both personal and monetary.

Much of the opposition to this viewpoint stems from judgments directed against the existing public welfare machinery and its social worker agents. The public welfare agency as the residuary legatee of all society's failures on other fronts is the built-in scapegoat. Taxpayers berate it for excessive leniency and its clients for excessive harshness. But like any other governmental agency, it is the instrument of public laws and attitudes. To the extent that these are harsh, restrictive and inadequate, so, too, is their agent, the public welfare department. Any other agency required under these circumstances to spread too little money over too great a range of legally-entitled need would soon suffer from the same characteristics. The remedy lies in changing the attitudes of the general public.

Present public welfare laws, reflecting anachronistic public attitudes are clearly outdated. They still reflect the impoverished economy of the thirties, when reducing unemployment was the primary social goal and decentralized responsibility the dominating social heritage. By undertaking to guarantee employment for the employables (the rhetoric of 1935 spoke of guarantees though the appropriations were never adequate for the purpose and wartime labor shortages shortly made them unnecessary), three categories of need were singled out for federally-aided assistance. Support for these three categories—old age, blindness, and mothers responsible for small children—was thought to be a socially desirable method of relieving pressure on the labor market. It was assumed that the states should not only set the level of entitlement and support for these categories, but should be able to carry unaided the burden of general assistance for those needy not included in any federal measure. Small stimulative grants for child welfare services in rural areas and those of special need were also provided.

Over the years, the scope of federally-aided assistance has been broadened, though still within the concept of categorical limitations, and the level of federal financial participation has been raised, though still within a reimbursement formula that leaves the standard of assistance to state determination and favors those with low standards. In no sense can it be said that a national assistance policy has been achieved, since each state is free to determine the extent of its own responsibility both as to whom should be aided and at what level. Few states extend assistance to all needy; virtually all—to a greater or lesser extent—deny assistance to newcomers within the state, and the levels of assistance for the most part are far below any conceivable standard of health and decency. Yet many of those whose standards are the lowest (Mississippi, for example, with average per capita monthly allowances for children below $9.00) tax themselves more heavily than the average for this purpose.

Need for National Policy

Obviously, any nationwide remedy for this situation requires federal action which is comprehensive with respect to coverage, standards and financing. Those who argue for outright federalization can make a strong case that a nationwide program incorporating federal standards requires federal financing and cannot be left to the veto power of optional state implementation. The same argument can, however, be made with respect to many other responsibilities traditionally reserved to the states and so far centralizing moves have required oblique rather than direct action for political approval. (Even the unemployment insurance system, clearly a factor in interstate commerce, has been held to state-determined standards by a strongly states' rights resistance to change.)

The Advisory Council on Public Welfare chose the carrot approach to federal standards by proposing a transitionally optional system of financing whereby the federal government would meet in its entirety (above a stipulated fair share annual lump sum expenditure by the state, based on fiscal effort in relationship to its average per capita income) the cost of implementing federal standards. This concept of federal aid, originally the brainchild of the late Senator Robert Taft, places clearly on the federal government the financing of those extra costs resulting from its own standard setting.

It was the thought of the Advisory Council that this financing pattern might prove sufficiently attractive to the states to offset the political resistance which has so far met every effort at national advance. Its principal weakness is, of course, the possibility of state unwillingness to implement the program at any price. Most members of the Council thought this an unlikely contingency in view of its heavy economic price (no state has, for example, declined its costly option to forgo unemployment insurance) while others favored the ultimate sanction of federal administration in the case of state recalcitrance, as existed in the days of federal relief program.

The Council also favored the close association of minimum service standards with minimum income standards, applying the phrase Basic Social Guarantee to this combined approach. This recommendation runs counter to much of the current social orthodoxy which assumes that services are intrinsically a means of curtailing money payments. Again, all depends on popular attitudes and circumstances. The family bent on finding a child for adoption or decent nursing care for an aged relative does not look on social services in this light. The Council's assumption of adequate income from other sources for people capable of working and adequate replacement income for those with a family work history reduces the residual problem of income insufficiency to those with special social problems.

The real problem on both counts comes back to the central ideological confrontation of our times: the puritanical value system of the majority and the ghetto heritage of our principal minority groups. It is most sharply focused in the problem of support for abandoned children and alienated youth: the beneficiaries of our embattled program of Aid for Families Dependent Children. Not all children in this program are Negro, but the judgmental attitudes directed toward Negro alienation from social opportunities and social norms has contributed to the low standards in this program. But in all discussions, from the Moynihan report on the Negro family to the evaluations of the Comptroller General, the central issue seems to have been obscured: that protection of the welfare of children is one of the most ancient of social obligations.

In fact, an anthropologist, Earl Counts, in identifying that which differentiated man from the apes has this to say: "The pre-human juvenile became a human child when the hitherto private business that he is an appurtenance of a certain female becomes everybody's business."

By this standard our claim to humanity seems rather shaky in a day when the weight of public opinion and political action seems bent on forcing needy mothers off the assistance rolls regardless of the impact on their children of such deprivation and indignity. Instead of using the starvation of a child as means of punishing its mother, we need to look upon child welfare protections as involving support as well as social services.

We are now in the rather absurd situation of being willing to pay reasonable fees to a foster mother for the care of a child removed from its home while we deny comparable support to the same child in its own home.

The concept of child welfare services needs to be broadened to carry a built-in provision of income as essential to that protective service. Only in this way can we extend the reality of a protective society to all children without regard to race, income or our judgments regarding the past actions of their parents. No challenge to our democratic pretensions outweighs the need to assure protective provisions for children, primary charge on the social conscience of mankind.

In our work-oriented society the major solution to unemployment, under-employment and most poverty is the opportunity for a regular job at decent wages. For the unemployed and the under-employed, as well as for the children of all impoverished families, there is no more realistic route out of poverty than gainful employment.

The O'Hara bill gets directly to the heart of this issue. It authorizes $4 billion of federal grants to federal, state and local government agencies and private non-profit organizations, in the first year of operation, for the creation of up to one million public service jobs for the unemployed and under-employed. Moreover, the services that would be provided by this program are badly needed, socially useful work that would not otherwise be done.

The bill proposes, with utter simplicity, that America meet two of its pressing national problems—unemployment and a backlog of unmet public service needs. It does this through a program that would put one million unemployed and under-employed people to work, at not less than the federal minimum wage or the prevailing wage, whichever is the higher, in performing badly needed services in parks, schools, hospitals, playgrounds, libraries, public buildings and similar institutions in the government and private non-profit sectors of the economy.

THIS ARTICLE IS EXCERPTED from the testimony of AFL-CIO President George Meany before a House Education and Labor subcommittee in support of a bill introduced by Rep. James G. O'Hara (D-Mich.). The O'Hara bill would create 1 million public service jobs for the unemployed and under-employed.

In advocating the idea of a public service employment program in February 1966, the tripartite National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress declared that:

"Employing the unemployed is, in an important sense, almost costless. The unemployed consume; they do not produce. To provide them meaningful jobs increases not only their income but that of society. Much of the work that needs doing calls only for limited skills and minor amounts of training . .

"The public service employment program should be coupled with basic education, training and counseling to raise the productivity of the employes and assist them to move on to better jobs. With this assistance, the opportunity for higher incomes would provide the necessary incentive to seek other jobs. Since the jobs would provide services for which society has growing needs, no element of make-work would be involved."

Early enactment of this bill would get such programs under way. It would provide the keystone for the government's numerous anti-poverty efforts among people of working age, as well as the various private programs to provide jobs for some of the hard-core unemployed. It would be a resounding act of federal government commitment to help the unemployed and under-employed lift themselves and their families out of poverty.

Unfortunately, largescale pockets of unemployment and under-employment in our urban centers and depressed rural areas have become a social cancer, despite the general economic improvements of the past seven years. The rise of sales, production and employment of the 1960s has not provided enough job opportunities for the most disadvantaged, unskilled, inexperienced jobseekers—particularly Negroes and teenagers—in a period of spreading automation and rapid growth of the labor force.

In 1967, according to the official reports of the Labor Department, there were 3 million unemployed or 3.8 percent of the civilian labor force. Among Negroes in the labor force, 7.4 percent were reported to be unemployed. Among teenagers, 12.9 percent were unemployed and for Negro teenagers the percentage was 26.3 percent.

However, the government's report of 3 million unemployed in 1967 is an economic statistic—an average for the year as a whole. Such an economic statistic, however, does not adequately measure how great an impact unemployment has on people. The situation—in human terms—is much greater and more serious.

In 1966, when reported unemployment was about the same as last year, the government's survey of the work-experience of the population showed that 11.4 million people were unemployed sometime during the course of the year; 3.4 million had two or more periods of joblessness; 2.4 million were unemployed 15 weeks or more during the year and 1.5 million of these long-term unemployed were men; 2.2 million Negroes were unemployed during the course of 1966 and one-third of them were jobless for 15 weeks and more. A similar situation existed in 1967, as the government's report will indicate when it is published.

Revealing as these reported figures are on the extent of unemployment, it is now widely recognized that they are an understatement.

This understatement is partly due to the fact that the 1960 decennial census did not accurately count the population. This was particularly true in urban slums and depressed rural areas. It is also due to the fact that people who have given up seeking jobs are not counted as unemployed. The greatest social problems are among those who are not counted—those who are so cut off from the mainstream of American society that they are not included in the officially-reported, regular statistics.

Estimates of the unemployment undercount vary—some go as high as 3 million or more. The estimate of the AFL-CIO Research Department is that the understatement is in the neighborhood of 1.5 million, possibly more.

This would mean that there were approximately 4.5 million unemployed, on the average, in 1967. It would mean that about 13 million people were unemployed during the course of the year and about 3.5 million to 4 million were unemployed 15 weeks and more.

In addition, we have the Labor Department's reports on under-employment. In 1967, there were 2.2 million people who were reported to have been compelled to work part-time because fulltime jobs were not available.

In recent years, therefore, there have been about 3 million to 5 million people who have been unemployed for long periods of time or have been seriously under-employed.

This situation is even more serious than it looks on the surface, because it is not evenly distributed throughout the country and across the entire population. It is concentrated—with dire social implications—in the slum districts of our urban centers and in depressed rural areas.

In a special survey of 10 urban slum areas in November 1966, the Labor Department found that approximately one-third of the population of working age had serious job and income problems—unemployment, under-employment and very low yearly incomes. This would mean that about 10 percent to 15 percent of the adult men and about 40 percent to 50 percent of out-of-school teenagers—including those not usually counted—were unemployed in the slum districts of our major cities in November 1966. The situation in urban slum areas is only a bit better in early 1968.

As for rural areas, the Commission on Rural Poverty estimated that approximately 18 percent of adults in such areas are under-employed. A measure of the problem in less-populated areas of the country can be seen in the Labor Department's report for March 1968 that there was substantial or persistent unemployment in 487 small rural communities—about the same as two years before.

In terms of human beings, families and communities, therefore, the problem of unemployment and under-employment is far more serious than official reports usually indicate. And this problem is highly concentrated in urban slum districts and depressed rural areas—particularly among Negroes, Mexican-Americans, Puerto Ricans and Indians.

Moreover, many of these unemployed and under-employed people have very little, if any, education, vocational training or regular work-experience. Many of them, too, are rural migrants from the southern states into the cities of the North and West, or the children of such migrants. Ill-equipped to compete in the regular labor market, they are unemployed or part-time occasional workers—frequently people who have drifted outside the government's usual statistical reports.

So a key answer to this problem is jobs now—not next year or the year after.

And public institutions, in both urban and rural areas, have an urgent need for the services that these people can perform.

Let us put these two needs together constructively—as this bill does—and get this program on the road, now.

Such employment at the wage floors provided in the bill should include provisions for assistance to help these people move up the job and income ladder to better-paying and more-skilled jobs in public and private employment. The immediate need is regular employment, linked with literacy training, guidance, counseling and training in skills.

Moreover, the program envisioned in this bill does not preclude the importance of private business efforts to hire some of the hard-core unemployed. But the process of business hiring—depending on general economic expansion and the opening of unskilled, entry jobs in private business—can hardly be expected to meet the needs of the large numbers of disadvantaged unemployed and under-employed rapidly enough.

Let me, at this point, make a comment on the proposals to "let private business take care of the problem."

The fact is the private sector just cannot do the job alone. I think it is time the Congress faces up to this fact and stops trying to pass the buck to private employers.

We think the jobs program of the National Alliance of Businessmen—to hire and train 500,000 hard-core unemployed people during the next three years—is a good idea and we are doing our best to be helpful. But even if its program is a 100 percent success, it will only make a dent in the problem—with 3 million to 5 million long-term unemployed or seriously under-employed people at present.

When we look ahead we find that America's labor force is growing rapidly—about 1.5 million a year in the next 10 years. And the spread of automation is reducing labor requirements in some industries, increasing the educational and skill requirements of many jobs and moving industry location from cities to the suburbs and countryside.

The American economy must expand rapidly to prevent the present level of unemployment from rising by providing jobs for new entrants into the labor force and for those displaced by automation. Unless immediate action is taken to provide a million public service jobs now, largescale pockets of unemployed and under-employed disadvantaged people will persist as a spreading danger to the fabric of American society, even if the economy continues to expand normally.

A halt to general economic expansion or a recession, of course, would mean rising unemployment and under-employment—a potentially explosive situation. But even the present size of the problem has serious social consequences.

Federal action to create one million public service jobs must be the keystone of any realistic national effort to employ the long-term unemployed and seriously under-employed. The government must be the employer of last resort and the time for such action is now!

At this point, someone may say: "Fine, but is it feasible?"

There is ample evidence to prove that such a program is as workable as it is necessary.

Two studies in the past several years report a public service employment potential of between 4 million and over 5 million jobs (4.3 million according to a study by Greenleigh Associates and 5.3 million reported by a study for the Automation Commission).

This need in urban and rural public services and private, non-profit institutions can rapidly be translated into one million jobs within a year, if the funds are made available.

Dr. John W. Gardner, Chairman of the Urban Coalition, recently reported:

"To find out how many socially useful jobs could be made available immediately, the Urban Coalition asked Dr. Harold Sheppard of the Upjohn Institute to survey a sample of major cities. Based upon a preliminary analysis of this survey, Dr. Sheppard has concluded that at least 141,000 persons could be employed almost overnight in the 130 cities with population over 100,000. These would be jobs in regular city departments where supervisors are already available and work tasks are clearly defined. If this sample were expanded to small cities, to county and state governments and to jobs with private, non-profit organizations, it is likely that enough jobs could be found to put 500,000 persons to work within six months. By further planning, the number might be expanded to a million or more within a year.

"A public service employment program would not only enable unemployed to earn their own way; it would benefit the general public by the many necessary and useful tasks which would be performed."

I agree completely with Dr. Gardner.

We in the AFL-CIO have been warning about unemployment and the social ills it breeds for the last dozen years. Eight years ago, it was the major burden of our testimony to the platform committees of both parties.

We've said it repeatedly in every conceivable forum and we've been greeted with indifference by the Congress.

Now the Congress can no longer delay. Now the Congress can no longer pretend unemployment will disappear if no one notices it. Now the Congress is hearing the voices of the people all over this land.

Now the Congress must act.

In view of the rising interest in the subject of the guaranteed income and family allowances as an alternative, or addition, to the existing welfare system, this office has put together a short bibliography of books and articles on these subjects. It is an updated version of a similar bibliography prepared by the U. S. Department of Labor Library in 1966.

GUARANTEED INCOME, THE NEGATIVE INCOME TAX, AND FAMILY ALLOWANCES : SELECTED REFERENCES

Early proposals for guaranteeing an income are included in the following references:

The proposals set forth by Lady Rhys-Williams are the basis for this income redistribution system, whereby every individual would be paid a "social dividend" which would replace all the positive allowances receivable under insurance and assistance.

Family allowances in Britain were adopted as a result of the famous "Beveridge Report " (William H. Beveridge, Report on Social Insurance and Allied Services, 1942).

Two recent exponents of guaranteed income and negative income tax are Robert Theobald, a British economist who advocates a guaranteed income for all, and Milton Friedman, a University of Chicago economist said to be the first American to propose the negative income tax plan. Their proposals are set forth in the following works:

In 1964 the Ad Hoc Committee on the Triple Revolution published a statement connecting the revolutions in cybernation, weaponry and civil rights, and suggesting that society undertake an unqualified commitment to provide every individual and every family with an adequate income as a matter of right. Guaranteed Income

January 9, 1969

I am Mrs. Ethel M. Mathews, Chairman of the Welfare Rights Organization, local Emmaus House Chapter, Atlanta, Georgia.

This is our program for 1970. Much has been said and written about inadequacies of our present welfare system as we press toward a guarenteed adequate income. Much can be done to improve the welfare system now. The following should be implemented immediately:

1. Our 1970 program will be to ask the Federal Government to require all states to provide special grants for clothing, household furnishings, and other basic needs to insure that recipients have the minimum standards for health and decency.

2. We will also demand that regulations be changed so that welfare payments can be made to a family when the father is present in the home and unemployed or otherwise so poor that he cannot support his family decently. This will help to keep families together and will give men a new interest in working and improving themselves. In the long run, it will save the state money.

3. Our 1970 program will demand that more poor people be better represented. We are asking that some more blacks be put on the Welfare Board and the Commision Board other than Mr. W. C. Scott, manager of the Atlanta World. We will ask for someone who knows the problems of the poor and who is concerned about the poor other than himself. We do not want people from Buckhead and from the rich section at Peachtree to say that they represent the poor because they do not know what the ghettoes are all about, and they don't know the meaning of poverty.

So this is our program for 1970; more adequate income for the poor, more dignity for the poor, more justice for the poor, and more democracy for all poor people regardless of race, creed, or color.

Bread and justice for all of us,

Mrs. M. Mathews,
WRO President

Americans worry about their environmental mess, consumers hear new warning

Consumers must get on the warpath about what's happening. And what's happening is not only shrunken paychecks. It's also shrunken air, water, and open space.

That's the message of Sen. Ed Muskie of Maine, who told the Consumer Assembly '69, "we must move now to renovate, rejuvenate and recapture our environment."

The latest sign that consumerism is the biggest political surprise package of the season came last week as some 600 true believers came to Washington for two days of speech-listening, resolution-voting, and viewing-with-alarm.

Muskie gave a low-key political warning to the new occupants of the White House. It was a signal the conservation claque which turned the nation upside down over the Hickel appointment, is now ready to link hands with consumerism's crusaders. It could turn out to be a people's lobby which can overthrow the barons of normalcy.

"Air pollution alert systems have been established in many of our major cities. Emphysema, bronchitis and other chronic respiratory diseases continue to increase in geometric proportions," Muskie warned.

"And our landscape is scarred. Land developers, highway builders, and strip miners have laid waste to the countryside with little or no regard to erosion or siltation control. We abandon our litter and bury and burn our garbage with little or no thought to the environmental effects or the waste resources."

Americans are increasingly resentful and worried about the environmental mess they are surrounded with. The national uproar over the Hickel appointment to the Department of Interior came as a surprise to many politicians, but it was a sign that Americans will demand a quality environment which includes more than clean air and water.

'Tragedies come and go but I always manage to survive.

Money Gap: Why we are in trouble

GUARANTEED INCOME

There's a better way than paying out pyramiding welfare

Pay people not to work? Why, that's absolutely insane. It goes against the Puritan ethic, against common sense, against everything right and proper.

Yet we now pay out $9.8 billion in federal, state and local welfare payments. The bulk goes to dependent children ($2.9 billion) needy older people ($1.7 billion), aid to the disabled ($655 million), and in outright welfare payments ($437 million)—all for not working.

Most people agree our present welfare system is demeaning and unfair to taxpayers who pay the welfare bill and to those who receive welfare.

The question is: How can we best help the needy, do it fairly, and do it within a decent, dignified framework?

Some of the best brains in America are trying to figure this out. They range from such cautious thinkers as Prof. Milton Friedman, Sen. Goldwater's chief financial adviser, to far-out members of the New Left. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, a citadel of the status quo, two years ago conducted a national symposium on guaranteed income which aired the issue exhaustively.

In the parlance of political Washington, "income maintenance" is on the front burner. It's an issue which seems destined to be decided soon as the cost of welfare mushrooms and people search for better alternatives.

Let's agree on one thing and discard a common myth. A good job at a decent rate of pay is the goal of most people. We can debate endlessly how many professional goldbrickers pocket government checks without working. The average person, given a chance to work, will choose a job with a regular paycheck.

Income maintenance ought never be more attractive than regular employment. Every scheme—negative income tax, guaranteed income, or child allowance—envisages regular paycheck jobs as preferable to any substitute welfare or relief program.

A lot of poor people work today at poverty wages. They often work for less than a full year. They work, far below the poverty level (anywhere from $3,000 to $4,000 a year, depending on the locality). A yet visionary $2 an hour federal minimum wage (should it ever pass) amounts to only $4,000 a year, based on a 40-hour week, 52 weeks in a year.

Our present welfare system puts a penalty on a person who does work while on welfare.

A working mother is penalized today for working if she's entitled to $2,000 worth of welfare a year. For every $100 she gets in welfare, she must pay back $100 she earns from working. She can never get ahead.

Among the 8 million on relief, only about 60,000 are able-bodied men. The majority are either too young, too old, too sick or too disabled to be self-supporting.

In most states, notes Congressman William Ryan, "if a welfare family receives $200 monthly and the mother earns $100 scrubbing floors, the local welfare agency promptly reduces the benefit by $100, leaving the family no better off, and providing no economic incentive for working."

If anything makes goldbrickers or malingerers, it's the welfare setup we have today where this happens.

Under the guaranteed income idea proposed by Congressman Ryan, only $50 would be deducted up to an agreed upon level. Thus, the person builds an income and is encouraged to find work and secure regular income where this is physically possible.

Most of those on welfare today could not work, even if there were jobs. Out of 8 million on welfare, 3 million are over age 65, blind or disabled; 4 million are dependent children; and 1.26 million are parents with dependent children (160,000 fathers and 1.1 million mothers).

Employment among some of the 1.26 million parents with dependent children might be possible. It would be cruel, however, to cut off these parents from any assistance without providing day care centers or some means to hold their families together.

The Ryan plan would make little dent on New York, but would have a revolutionary impact in poor states like Mississippi. It would lift the income of 80 percent of the nation's poor people and cost little more than one month of

For the many who are unable to work we must find ways to put a floor of economic security and decency under their lives. Our present welfare system becomes continually more bureaucratic and more costly, yet it fails to provide even a basic income. A family of four should have at least $4,160 a year—yet millions upon millions of Americans scratch out a miserable existence below that minimum level.

New welfare restrictions in the Social Security Amendments of 1967 are cruel and harsh, and they are self-defeating. They impose new difficulties and restrictions upon people who depend on welfare checks to stay alive and to raise their children. These amendments weaken the core of society, the family unit, by forcing fathers to desert their children and mothers to leave them alone at home while they go out to work. They put burdensome financial loads on already fiscally pinched state governments.

The Kerner Commission properly notes:

"Our present system of welfare is designed to save money instead of people, and tragically ends up doing neither. First, it excludes large numbers of persons who are in great need, and who, if provided a decent level of support, might be able to become more productive and self-sufficient. No federal funds are available for millions of men and women who are needy but neither aged, handicapped nor parents of minor children. Second, for those who are included, the system provides assistance well below the minimum necessary for a decent level of existence, and imposes restrictions that encourage dependency on welfare and undermines self-respect."

Congress must move boldly in a whole new approach to the needs of the poor. The most practical approach is through a guaranteed income that will meet the needs of all and eliminate the costly and often tyrannical welfare bureaucracy.

Welfare reform

A 'guaranteed income' vs. welfare

Chart by Christian Science Monitor

Say a destitute mother with three dependent children is entitled to $2,000 a year in welfare. Then, under the present system, $100 is deducted from the monthly welfare check if she goes out and earns $100 that month. Thus, she won't improve her family's income at all until she can earn more than $2,000. Few can. The result: little incentive to work and no financial improvement. On the other hand, under a guaranteed-income plan, the welfare check would be reduced by only $50 for every $100 earned up to a break-even point of $4,000 total yearly income. Result: an incentive to work and a higher standard of living. The federal price tag for such a plan: $4.1 billion more than the cost of the present welfare system. But with demands on that system escalating, the price difference could soon disappear.

the Vietnam war, or half the cost of the space program for a year. Most important of all, it would halt the flow of the rural poor into congested, beleaguered cities where ill-trained people find no way to fit into the complex job market.

There are roughly 30 million people living below the $3,300 poverty level today. They form 15 percent of our population and 25 percent of all children. We pay out $8 billion in welfare supposedly to help the poor, and we're still in bad shape. For another $4 billion, under the Ryan plan, we could rescue 24 million people from the worst clutches of poverty.

Sylvia Porter, an economist, states that among the 8 million on relief "only about 60,000 are able-bodied men. The majority are either too young, too old, too sick or too disabled to be self-supporting."

But with the help of day-care centers or children's allowances, some of the welfare mothers might be put into the stream of gainfully employed citizens. We ought not expect miracles. There are, contrary to some common myths, not millions of loafers on the government dole. The facts prove the contrary.

The price tag for income maintenance plans runs the gamut from $4 billion for Congressman Ryan's version of guaranteed income, to $10 to $26 billion for the negative income tax, and $10 billion for a children's allowance.

Many conservatives today favor some kind of guaranteed income because today's hodge-podge welfare systems are proving more costly year by year. And it does not seem to work. Consequently conservative Prof. Milton Friedman supports a negative income tax. He would pay a flat rate to families to make up the difference between their income and a level which would put them above a poverty level, using a sliding scale as a spur to earn more money.

The pricetag for income maintenance is less than the cost of a month of war or a year of the space program. Most people, given a chance to work, will choose a job with a regular paycheck.

Many scorn any guaranteed income plan. They sincerely feel it would ruin our free enterprise system and make it too easy for people to loaf at the expense of hardworking taxpayers.

It goes against our grain to see people get something for nothing. But packed firmly into our American system of government are many kinds of subsidies (maritime, agricultural, postal, aircraft, and others). The U.S. Treasury recently listed $550 billion worth of tax loopholes (they were called "tax expenditures" in the Treasury report) available for people in all income groups.

There ought to be a way to eliminate every vestige of poverty in this land of affluence. Many conservatives and liberals agree on this goal. The question before the nation is, how can the goal best be reached.

WEEKEND WRAPUP

Why is crime on the upswing? Why so many muggings, bank heists, and burglaries? Why? Coddling criminals? The Supreme Court? Tricky lawyers, Easy bail? There's little doubt the entire nation suffers a crime wave of major proportions. Court calendars are congested. Many criminals get off on bail and repeat their criminal acts before they are hailed before a judge. "Law and order" during the last campaign was a code-word for "get the nigger." Crime is rampant among low-income, minority, chronically unemployed in the ghettos. Black Americans are victimized by more crime than any others. What do we do? The President's commission on violence reports, as did the crime commission earlier, that crime is more widespread among youth than others. Our population today is predominately youthful. Black kids and white kids, poor kids and rich—are more apt to hold up a store, steal a bike, or even rob a bank than any person in his thirties or forties. Crime is a price we pay for easy affluence. We neglected our schools, our youth programs, our cities. Now we pay a price, a very heavy price. Teen age kids burst with energy and enthusiasm. They can easily shift from the bugaloo to shoplifting. The frug can turn to bank robbing—on a post-adolescent dare, for some emotional inner torment, or from outright boredom with idleness or too much comfort. The violence commission's report tells what happened to 10,000 boys born in 1945. Of 10,000 boys, 3,475 became juvenile delinquents, committing a total of 10,214 delinquent acts ranging from petty offenses to homicides. Half of these boys were only one-time offenders. More importantly, 629 were chronic offenders (five or more delinquent acts) who accounted for 5,305 crimes, or 52 percent of all offenses committed by the entire group. Their offenses were the more serious ones, including a majority of the homicides. They represented only a small minority (18 percent of the juvenile and 6 per cent of the total group), yet these 627 youths account for the major cost to society from juvenile crimes. . . . Shirley Chisholm stood up in the back of the Democratic caucus in the House of Representatives last week and started something—thanks to the Democratic Study Group, which won the right of a monthly party caucus. Shirley is a wispy black sister who deeply resented her placement on the forestries subcommittee of the House Agriculture Committee. She stood up and asked for a new committee, and Chairman Wilbur Mills said he will try to fix up something better suited to the militant black lady from Bedford-Styvestant. The fact that this first black woman ever elected to Congress was asked to mess around in the forestries subcommittee was a deep insult to her, her race, and to the democratic system. We hope Mr. Mills rectifies the mistake. . . . Secretary Hickel dug his political grave a little deeper by hiring a Chamber of Commerce lobbyist who fought high water quality standards. Mr. Hickel got a good education from the Senate Interior Committee, but we wonder how much education rubbed off on the dirty water lobbyist who took him around Capitol Hill and seems destined to call the shots from inside Interior. Conservation and consumer issues—plus tax reform—are some of the hottest political issues in the country, and they will not disappear with prayer from Billy Graham, nor by decorous fielding of questions at a presidential press conference. . . . Tax reform got a push forward this past week as the House Ways and Means Committee announced two months of hearings. We only hope matters won't get worse, instead of better. Insiders say they will fight to get an open rule so amendments can be made on the House floor. Far too many deals get cut behind closed doors in the Ways and Means Committee where conservatives have the upperhand. A flat rate for all high income groups—who can often escape paying any tax whatsoever—seems certain of approval. The Reuss $9 billion tax reform package is a reasonable proposal to end the 10 percent surtax by midsummer. It calls for ending the 7 percent investment credit which big business dearly loves. A cool $3 billion goes down the drain from this bonanza to corporations. Says Reuss: "Our economy has been over stimulated and we are now in a period of serious inflation, fed in part by the investment tax credit. The credit concentrates inflationary spending power on precisely that portion of the economy that is already most overheated—the capital goods sector." Mr. Mills please copy.

See Your Congressman: The House of Representatives takes a Lincoln's Birthday recess from Feb. 7 until Feb. 17. Your local congressman may be at home during this time. Talk to him about tax reform, ask him to endorse the Reuss $9 billion tax loophole-plugging bill which can end the 10 percent surtax.

NIXON IS WEIGHING FLOOR ON INCOME AS RELIEF REFORM

Congress to Get Alternative Plans to End Inequities in Welfare Systems

By JOHN HERBERS
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 22 — The Nixon Administration has decided to give welfare reforms a high priority in its domestic programs and is at work on alternative plans to submit to Congress, probably within the next month or so.

One idea that is being considered, along with other basic reforms, is a form of income maintenance that would be a step toward a nationally guaranteed minimum income.

That is why the Nixon budget calls for more money for experimental income maintenance projejcts than did the Johnson budget—more than $9-million, as compared with $4-million.

Administration sources said that the matter was likely to be before Congress for many months and that it was important to move as quickly as possible to determine the economic and social effects of replacing the present welfare system with some form of income maintenance.

'Well-Designed Experiments'

"I want to go ahead, as quickly as possibly, with a series of well-designed income maintenance experiments," said Robert H. Finch, the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, in a recent departmental memorandum.

Welfare reform has been a matter of priority within the Administration since President Nixon took office, but it has not moved far within the complex decision-making machinery that the President hs set up.

A first-round decision on what White House sources described as "exciting proposals" was to have been made yesterday within the President's Council on Urbn Afairs, but this was postponed. Officials up and down the line have been reluctant to discuss details of the plan or of the intra-Administration debate surrounding it.

One explanation of the postponement, according to a department official, was that further cost estimates were needed and that no decision could be made until these were completed.

The matter was further complicated by the Supreme Court decision yesterday ruling out residence requirement for persons otherwise eligible for public assistance. This promises to put as many as 200,000 more people on the welfare rolls, which now contain about 8.5 million.

The ruling, Mr. Finch said at a news conference, will "modify substantially the proposals we have at the White House" due to the etxra costs and will increase the pressures for instituting national standards into the system.

Both Mr. Finch and President Nixon have favored moving toward a system of national standards. One reason is the need to narrow the gap in payments from state to state. Mississippi, for example, pays an average of $8.50 a month to dependent children, while New York pays $71.50.

The gaps are believed to step up migration of poor families from rural areas to the cities, which are staggering under welfare loads.

Thus, the ruling that persons cannot be required to live in an area for a specified time before drawing welfare could cause even more migration to the cities.

Pressures Increase

Political pressures for making basic changes in the welfare system have increased ever since the new Administration took office. They come from all political persuasions and from all regions of the country.

The Nixon Administration has made it clear that, whatever specific changes it recommends to Congress, the stress will be on more work training and jobs for those able to work, the adoption of Federal standards and the assumption of more of the cost by the Federal Government. However, it has rejected proposals from Governor Rockefeller and others that the Federal Government take over the entire system.

FLOOR ON INCOME

Last week, President Nixon said in his domestic message to Congress:

"Our studies have demonstrated that tinkering with the present welfare system is not enough. We need a complete reappraisal and redirection of programs which have aggravated the troubles they were meant to cure, perpetuating a dismal cycle of dependency from one generation to the next."

The burden for reform so far has been in the hands of an Urban Affairs Council subcommittee headed by Mr. Finch. Among those working with him have been Under Secretary John G. Veneman; Richard P. Nathan, assistant director of the Bureau of the Budget. and John Price, a member of the council staff.

A Working Paper

One of the working papers for the group was the report of a panel headed by Mr. Nathan and appointed by Mr. Nixon before he took office. That report, portions of which have been published in The New York Times, points to the general direction of the proposals now befort the White House.

One of its recommendations has, in fact, already been accepted by Mr. Nixon. That is his request that the Congressional "freeze" on payments to families with dependent children, scheduled to take effect next July 1, be postponed at least another year.

Such a freeze, Mr. Finch said at the time Mr. Nixon's budget was released, "could impose a nearly intolerable fiscal burden on the states," which would have to cover rising costs, estimated at $322-million for the 1970 fiscal year. The amount was included in the Nixon budget.

This indicates the tone of the proposals that have been placed before the White Hous.

The panel's report called for a series of changes in the basic system. Chiefly, the Federal Government would make minimum payments for aid to dependent children, thus putting a Federal floor under the state payments, and would make minimum payments in the same manner for the aged, the blind and the disabled—or put them all under the Social Security system, thus federalizing that aspect of the welfare system.

Why Do the Welfare Rolls Keep Rising?

By JONATHAN SPIVAK

WASHINGTON — President Nixon has asked his top domestic policy experts to explore a deeply perplexing social phenomenon —the explosive increase in the nation's relief rolls in an era of unparalleled economic prosperity.

Unemployment is around its lowest point since the Korean War, the number of poor has dramatically declined in just the last decade, and an immense array of new social programs is furnishing billions to uplift the impoverished.

Yet the number of persons receiving public welfare payments continues to skyrocket. New York City alone has added one half million recipients to its relief rolls since 1966—about double its increase in the preceding two decades. Nationally, the relief rolls are rising almost 10% a year, with no letup in sight, and most of the increase is in a single category—Aid to Families with Dependent Children.

AFDC, which costs the most, $3 billion a year, and has the most recipients, six million, was created in the New Deal as a small-scale help for widows and orphans. Today it is a prime source nationally of financial support for impoverished children, mainly in families where there is no father.

Bafflement All Around

The President's Council of Economic Advisers, urban affairs expert Daniel P. Moynihan, authorities in the Departments of Labor and of Health, Education and Welfare all are seeking to explain the current welfare "crisis." But in the end Mr. Nixon is likely to remain as baffled as ever. For, surprisingly, despite the staggering stacks of statistics and multiplicity of solutions, no one really knows exactly what's causing it.

For many years, the association between the size of the AFDC rolls and the unemployment rate furnished a simple and logical economic explanation; when unemployment went up, so did the welfare lists. But in the early 1960s unemployment started a more or less steady decline, yet welfare continued to rise. Then in 1966 the increase in the welfare rolls unexpectedly escalated from 250,000 new recipients a year to 800,000, and the flood of poor families to relief has not receded since.

What happened — migration, immorality, maladministration or intended munificence? The welter of welfare statistics supports conflicting conclusions, and simple explanations are suspect because of vast variations in local welfare policies and glaring gaps in the data.

Do fathers desert in order to make their families eligible for AFDC? Most welfare specialists suspect this occurs, but there are no studies to document it or to determine the degree. Clients don't volunteer such information to their caseworkers.

Is the fundamental cause illegitimacy, particularly prevalent among Negro women who constitute a growing proportion of AFDC recipients? But more than one-third of illegitimate births are white, and the overall increase in illegitimacy has not been sudden or sizable enough to account for the welfare explosion.

pansion of the AFDC program. The rolls increased by only one million individuals from 1949 to 1959. But most welfare experts believe the population shift could have created the conditions for the current increase. Hundreds of thousands of Negro poor were crowded into the Northern cities, where welfare has traditionally been liberally dispensed. Southern states, with their low per-capita income, provide minimal welfare grants and employ a variety of stratagems, such as "man in the house" rules, to exclude recipients on dubious legal grounds.

The first generation of rural emigrants may have been too ignorant and frightened to take advantage of relief. But now their children have grown to maturity in the North and are wiser in city ways. In any event, current migration is not causing the AFDC increase. The Northward Negro stream now has slowed to a trickle; some experts say it has stopped. Furthermore, welfare studies in New York, California and Maryland show that most of the poor who apply for aid have been local residents for at least a year. Thus, welfare policy hardly holds the key to redressing the urban-rural imbalance.

Other significant changes occurred. During the 1960s, Federal welfare standards were broadened and states substantially increased their grant payments. The national average AFDC payment for a family of four rose from $113 a month in 1960 to $166 in 1968, and "budget" standards, the theoretical living needs of the poor, also increased. This meant not only more money for those already on the rolls, but aid to many other families previously excluded because they had a little income.

The Negro proportion of poor fatherless families increased, though not their overall number. And the size of these families increased. Poor Negro mothers with lots of kids probably constitute the backbone of AFDC. They can't support their children on the menial jobs available to them, and indeed many are not even in the work force. Thus, some experts argue that the pre-1962 association between unemployment and AFDC was either coincidental or merely masked more fundamental social changes.

In a pioneering effort to explain the current AFDC increase, the Maryland Welfare Department pinpointed two possibilities: Urban renewal and neighborhood anti-poverty activities. The renewal program, it noted, threw displaced Negro slum-dwellers onto the relief rolls in the process of their relocation. The anti-poverty program publicized the availability of welfare and promoted applications by the poor. "When poor people are everywhere encouraged to make use of these resources . . . a surge of response must be expected," the Maryland report stated. It dealt with a period, ending in 1956, when the Federal Office of Economic Opportunity was just getting under way.

Since then the impact of the OEO and other "Great Society" program on public welfare has become manifest in many more cities, and probably increasingly pervasive. New York City's phenomenal AFDC rise can perhaps be best understood as a product of anti-poverty ferment. But no one has devised a means of precise measurement or absolute proof that AFDC would not have increased just as steeply anyway.

The National Welfare Rights Organization, which claims to have 30,000 AFDC mother members, mostly Negro and Puerto Rican, belligerently seeks more money for those already on the rolls. Its strategy is to create conflict and confrontation by "sit-ins" and "marches" on local welfare headquarters. Its publicized successes—usually gaining "special" extra grants for furniture or clothing—probably have attracted more of the poor to public assistance.

The Courts and Commitment

OEO-supported lawyers have won key court decisions extending welfare coverage and limiting the discretion of local agencies in denying aid. The Poor People's March on Washington in 1968 won a commitment from HEW to furnish legal help to recipients whose right to relief was challenged.

Community campaigns to enroll the poor in other Federal programs, such as "Medicaid," have added to the relief rolls as a by-product. Local agitation has forced welfare departments to publicize their grant-making procedures in intelligible form for the first time. Antipoverty agencies also have helped clients battle the welfare bureaucracy, encouraged more applications for aid and produced more liberal local administration. In short, the Great Society enlarged the demand for welfare and also increased its supply.

"My main conclusion is that the increase in the caseload is a good thing. More eligible families are getting assistance, so the system is in this sense working better," sums up one White House welfare specialist.

This judgment is shared by many other Nixon Administration officials, and may be quite correct. But until the precise causes of the AFDC increase are more accurately diagnosed, many Americans—including perhaps the President himself—will continue to regard the consequences with concern and criticism.

steady decline, yet welfare continued to rise. Then in 1966 the increase in the welfare rolls unexpectedly escalated from 250,000 new recipients a year to 800,000, and the flood of poor families to relief has not receded since.

What happened — migration, immorality, maladministration or intended munificence? The welter of welfare statistics supports conflicting conclusions, and simple explanations are suspect because of vast variations in local welfare policies and glaring gaps in the data.

Do fathers desert in order to make their families eligible for AFDC? Most welfare specialists suspect this occurs, but there are no studies to document it or to determine the degree. Clients don't volunteer such information to their caseworkers.

Is the fundamental cause illegitimacy, particularly prevalent among Negro women who constitute a growing proportion of AFDC recipients? But more than one-third of illegitimate births are white, and the overall increase in illegitimacy has not been sudden or sizable enough to account for the welfare explosion.

Is it changing policies on the part of local welfare agencies? The "acceptance rate"—the proportion of applicants who were actually granted relief—rose from 56% in 1960 to 74% in 1968. The "termination rate" of those already on the rolls also steadily declined. Along with these changes, applications for relief rose rapidly. But such statistics simply describe a situation; they don't explain it.

To some welfare specialists, the trends evince official laxness. "In New York City where workers are hired off the street and put on a caseload in two days, you don't blame the applicant. The error is the caseworker's. Failure to investigate—that's the issue," insists one expert. But others take the opposite tack, arguing that liberalized policies are a legitimate political response to the economic needs of the poor. Moreover there is "a vast pool of people in the cities eligible for relief but not getting it," declares Richard Cloward of Columbia University, intellectual high priest of the welfare protest movement.

If slovenly administration is the cause, then diligent enforcement of the existing rules could perhaps stem the rise in the AFDC rolls. No doubt tightening the reins can hold down welfare costs, at least temporarily. A hard-line policy worked here in Washington, where Sen. Robert Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, sponsored a detective-like home investigation effort. While this snooping removed many ineligibles, no one knows how many deserving residents were intimidated from even applying for aid.

If the Cloward "reservoir" theory is valid, then the relief rolls will continue to climb despite an economic upturn or any crackdown. By Federal poverty-line standards, the 9 million poor who now receive public assistance payments constitute less than half those eligible. But each state maintains its own income criteria (often below the Federal level) and imposes other restrictions. It would take an immense Federal effort to accurately determine how many poor should be receiving aid.

Of the $7 billion a year in Federal, state and local welfare outlays, only a pittance is spent to find out why people go on the rolls (or why they get off). And much of this "research" has other objectives—to prove that bigger welfare benefits are essential or to rebut allegations of widespread cheating. Currently, on Congressional orders, HEW is seeking to find out why the New York City rolls are rising so rapidly. But the results won't be available for several months and could be inconclusive anyway. The study is partly psychological and subjective. Among the variables being examined is the possibility that the poor now feel less public "stigma" attached to the receipt of relief.

Causes Are Complex

In the absence of firmer facts, most welfare experts agree a complex of causes underlies the AFDC explosion. Among them: Migration to the cities, the organizing efforts of anti-poverty and welfare rights groups, urban renewal dislocation, Federal expansion of welfare programs, more liberal local administration and court decisions that have lowered legal barriers to welfare aid.

The list is lengthy and there's no consensus. Each specialist has his own favorite emphasis. "The number and percentage of children at risk is increasing. (There are) more broken families, and on the average more children per broken family," insists Alvin Schorr, a child welfare expert. "A most fundamental influence has been the massive migration of poor people into the cities and from the South to the North," declares George Wiley, executive director of the National Welfare Rights Organization. Yet no single factor can account for the staggering AFDC increase in the last decade—from three million to six million recipients.

The big rural exodus of the 1940s and 1950s did not, it's true, immediately produce an ex-

Nixon's big decision on welfare

With an announcement imminent, White House advisers battle over reform. The issue: propping up the present system versus an income guarantee

Within a few weeks President Nixon is expected to send Congress a program to reform the nation's 30-year-old welfare system. What legislators will do with the proposal is unknown, of course. But welfare experts fervently hope that within a few years Congress will end some of the system's worst abuses and send more federal money into strained state and local welfare budgets.

However, it's still too early to know exactly how far the President will go to replace the system that now pays out over $8-billion yearly to nearly 10-million needy Americans. Nixon is being coached on reform by two groups of insiders—each with different ideas on what to do:

- One set of advisers, led by Daniel Patrick Moynihan, head of the White House Urban Affairs Council, and Robert Finch, Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, wants the government to embark on an entirely new system that would guarantee a minimum income for all American families.
- The other group is led by Arthur F. Burns, counsellor to the President, who is dead set against income guarantees. Instead he would prop up the current system with national minimum benefit standards.

Arthur Burns would improve and expand present welfare system.

Two paths. The Moynihan-Finch Family Security System (FSS) would use a negative income tax to put a floor under the incomes of poverty families and supplement wages of the working poor. The scheme, estimated to cost at least $2-billion a year, could cut state and local welfare costs by about $600-million. Under it, 14-million Americans would benefit—nearly twice the number of poor in families that now get welfare.

Strong support for this reform is expected late this summer from the Commission on Income Maintenance Programs, a blue-ribbon group of 21 businessmen, academics, and public officials, that was set up last year by President Johnson. The commission, headed by Ben W. Heineman, chairman of Northwest Industries, Inc., reportedly will call for an $8-billion income-support system to benefit everyone officially designated as poor and many of the near-poor as well. The Heineman proposal also would give subsidies to single people and childless couples—not only families—for a total of some 36-million recipients.

Burns' proposal would be financed in part through a separate Administration plan for revenue-sharing with states. If a state failed to set welfare benefits at or above the national minimum, it would forfeit its entire amount of shared revenue.

Families on welfare under the Burns plan would get a least $30 or $40 a month per person; additional day-care centers would be started for welfare children whose parents would enroll in expanded mandatory job-training programs. Federal cost of the Burns plan probably would be under $2-billion, with possibly a $500-million saving for states and cities. Benefits would rise by about $400-million, but the total increase in recipients would be well under 1-million, mostly in the poorer states.

Timing. With the federal budget tighter than ever, both proposals sound ambitious. But neither plan, according to their proponents, could be run through Congress much before fiscal 1972, and by then the money might be available.

In any case, with many of the nation's 22-million poor demanding attention, Nixon's advisers doubt if the President can dally much longer before introducing a program. The present hand-me-down welfare system, which has been studied and scrutinized by scores of critical commissions in recent years, is ripe for a GOP offensive, say Nixon's advisers.

Both schemes would eliminate some of the worst problems of the current system.

States no longer would be free to set benefit levels as low as they want—although they could still set them higher by adding payments on top of the federal minimums. Now, even though Washington pays about 50% of the nation's welfare tab, benefit levels and eligibility rules are set by the states. Payments vary widely but generally are under official poverty levels—with a low of about $8 a month per recipient in Mississippi and highs of $60 or more in states like New York and Massachusetts.

In addition to narrowing differences among states, both plans also would raise benefits for 3-million adults on federal programs for the aged, blind, and disabled.

Split. Beyond these similarities, however, the two plans are wide apart. The biggest difference—and the major philosophical battle at the White House—focuses on the most controversial part of the old welfare system: the poor family, the 6-million people enrolled in programs for Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). This group of welfare recipients is growing fastest and causing local officials to turn to Washington for financial help and reforms. Burns wants to strengthen AFDC; Moynihan, Finch, and the Heineman Commission want to dump it.

Daniel P. Moynihan says all should have a guaranteed minimum income.

AFDC, the only federal program that pays money to able-bodied poor, was intended to help the widows and fatherless of the Depression. Now it has become a refuge for poor families that don't fit neatly into any other federally supported welfare category. More than half are black; in 1961, some 40% of the children were fatherless because of divorce, desertion, or separation, and 20% of the youngsters were illegitimate.

The program is charged with encouraging immorality because it pays benefits to illegitimate children. Critics also blame AFDC for breaking up families, because benefits are not paid when a husband is at home. This rule, say critics, forces men with low-earnings potential, to desert.

Some improvement in AFDC was expected in 1961, when a change in the law allowed children of unemployed fathers to receive benefits. So far, however, only 24 states have adopted the provision with varying definitions of "unemployment" that limit the number of eligible men.

Set rules. For Burns, the solution to AFDC lies in trimming the rolls as fast as possible by bolstering the program. In essence, he would put more money into day-care centers and mandatory job-training programs for AFDC.

Families would continue to work their way off welfare just as now, keeping the first $30 a month they earn. After that, welfare benefits are reduced 67¢ for every extra $1 earned until the entire welfare payment is "taxed" away.

Burns reportedly also would make the program for unemployed fathers mandatory for states. However, it is not clear how much leeway he would allow in state definitions of "unemployed."

The Moynihan approach rejects the idea of patching up AFDC. Instead it would do away with this program entirely, replacing it with the Family Security System. The sole determinants of eligibility and benefits levels would be family size and income—regardless of marital status. Training programs would be expanded; but participation would be voluntary, not mandatory.

Options. Under FSS, states would continue to have their own educational, health, and training services for the poor; but the benefit system would be separate with checks mailed directly to beneficiaries by the Internal Revenue Service or the Social Security Administration. Applicants simply would file for benefits and then submit quarterly income statements, with payments based on income over the previous four quarters. Washington would use a spot check system to catch FSS offenders just as with the present income tax system.

Under FSS, a family of four with no income probably would receive $1,500 a year, although a slightly more expensive plan with a $1,750 minimum is also under discussion. For 18 states, mainly in the South, this would exceed current AFDC standards and probably eliminate local AFDC matching programs. Other states might have to keep AFDC, but at less cost.

Payments under FSS would decline by 50¢ for every $1 the family unit earned on its own. They would cease altogether somewhat below the poverty income line—at $3,000 for a family of four.

This would mean that nearly all poor families would automatically qualify for an income subsidy. A family of four with a father earning $2,000 yearly would get a $500 supplement—50% of the family's FSS income gap. Analysts estimate that some 7-million Americans—70% of them white—now live in families where fathers work full time without earning enough to get out of poverty. A similar fate, they argue, awaits mothers now on AFDC, when they find a place in the job market.

Support. Advocates of FSS are convinced that such people deserve federal help. Says Robert Harris, technical director of the Heineman Commission: "If the government wants to eliminate poverty, it must offer people more than just a low-paying job—it must supplement incomes too."

So far the Burns group has shown little inclination to help the working poor, except those on AFDC. But in recent weeks, Burns has hinted he might compromise with an offer of federal money for local assistance programs, which in 15 states offer some help to the working poor. However, FSS advocates don't like this idea. The working poor, they argue, should get income support as a "matter of right," not as a matter of "welfare." They are loathe to set up another federal program with a wide variety of state regulations, benefits and administrative problems.

Advocates of a negative tax don't believe, as the Burns group seemingly does, that a small guaranteed income would make thousands of able-bodied Americans lazy.

James Lyday, project manager of the Office of Economic Opportunity's New Jersey experiment in the negative tax (page 114), says that early payments in the experiment have not produced any perceptible change in work behavior. But, he admits, it's too early to draw any conclusions about how poor Americans would react to a nationwide income support system. End

President Orders a Shift in Poverty Agency's Work—Senator Nelson Critical

WASHINGTON, Aug. 11—President Nixon's $4-billion plan to overhaul the nation's welfare system came under sharp attack today as he sent details of the proposal to Capitol Hill.

The National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition charged that Mr. Nixon's proposal would reduce purchasing power of the poor in 44 states by cutting off the receipt of Federal food stamps.

John R. Kramer, executive director of the council, said "the arithmetic, and not the rhetoric, of the Nixon system proves" that the Administration's pledge to eliminate hunger had become "a casualty of the war against inflation, with deflated pocketbooks and bellies the inevitable consequence."

Meanwhile, Mr. Nixon, working from the summer White House in San Clemente, Calif., told Congress in a formal message that his welfare plan would transform "a system frozen in failure and frustration into a system that would work and would encourage people to work."

Poverty Office Shift

The President also issued a statement directing the Office of Economic Opportunity to shift from operation of antipoverty programs to development of new approaches to social ills.

One key member of the Senate saw the revision as a retreat from the antipoverty drive. Senator Gaylor Nelson, the Wisconsin Democrat who chairs the Subcommittee on Unemployment, Manpower and Poverty, said in a statement that O.E.O. "apparently is to be an antiseptic laboratory, doing pure research on assorted small pilot projects."

Mr. Nixon's welfare message and poverty agency statement were refinements of his televised address last Friday, in

Excerpts From Nixon Message to Congress on Welfare Plan

Special to The New York Times

SAN CLEMENTE, Calif., Aug. 11—Following are excerpts and details of the message on welfare that President Nixon sent to the Congress today:

A measure of the greatness of a powerful nation is the character of the life it creates for those who are powerless to make ends meet.

If we do not find the way to become a working nation that properly cares for the dependent, we shall become a welfare state that undermines the incentive of the working man.

The present welfare system has failed us—it has fostered family breakup, has provided very little help in many states and has even deepened dependency by all too often making it more attractive to go on welfare than to go to work.

I propose a new approach that will make it more attractive to go to work than to go on welfare, and will establish a nationwide minimum payment to dependent families with children.

The Operation of the New Approach

We would assure an income foundation throughout every section of America for all parents who cannot adequately support themselves and their children. For a family of four with less than $1,000 income, this payment would be $1,600 a year; for a family of four with $2,000 income, this payment would supplement that income by $960 a year.

Under the present welfare system, each state provides "aid to families with dependent children," a program we propose to replace. The Federal Government shares the cost, but each state establishes key eligibility rules and determines how much income support will be provided to poor families.

The result has been an uneven and unequal system. The 1969 benefits average for a family of four is $171 a month across the nation, but individual state averages range from $263 to $39 a month.

A new Federal minimum of $1,600 a year cannot claim to provide comfort to a family of four, but the present low of $468 a year cannot claim to provide even the basic necessities.

The new system would do away with the inequity of very low benefit levels in some states, and of state-by-or for the married couple without children, the new system would not apply. Food stamps would continue to be available up to $300 per year per person, according to the plan I outlined last May in my message to the Congress on the food and nutrition needs of the population in poverty. For dependent families there will be an orderly substitution of food stamps by the new direct monetary payments.

DISCUSS O.E.O. POLICIES: President Nixon conferring with Donald L. Rumsfeld, director of the Office of Economic Opportunity, at the Summer White House in San Clemente, Calif., yesterday. The President has directed the O.E.O. to alter its mission, from the operation of antipoverty programs to the development of new approaches to social ills.

The new approach would end the blatant unfairness of the welfare system.

In over half the states, families headed by unemployed men do not qualify for public assistance. In no state does a family headed by a father working full-time receive help in the current welfare system, no matter how little he earns. As we have seen, this approach to dependence has itself been a cause of dependency. It results in a policy that tends to force the father out of the house.

The new plan rejects a policy that undermines family life. It would end the substantial financial incentives to the desertion. It would extend eligibility to all dependent families with children, without regard to whether the family is headed by a man or a woman.

from welfare to work by cutting benefits too fast and too much as earnings begin. The new system would encourage work by allowing the new worker to retain the first $720 of his yearly earnings without any benefit reduction.

For people already working, but at poverty wages, the present system often encourages nothing but resentment and an incentive to quit and go on relief where that would pay more than work. The new plan on the contrary, would provide a supplement that will help a low-wage worker—struggling to make ends meet—achieve a higher standard of living.

For an employable person who just chooses not to work, neither the present system nor the one we propose would support him, though both would continue to support other dependent members in his family.

However, a welfare mother with pre-school children should not face benefit reductions if she decides to stay home. It is not our intent that mothers of pre-school children must accept work. Those who can work and desire to do so, however, should have the opportunity for jobs and job training and access to day care centers for their children; this will enable them to support themselves after their children are

I believe the vast majority of poor people in the United States prefer to work rather than have the Government support their families. In 1968, 600,000 families left the welfare rolls out of an average caseload of 1,400,000 during the year, showing a considerable turnover, much of it voluntary.

However, there may be some who fail to seek or accept work, even with the strong incentives and training opportunities that will be provided. It would not be fair to those who willingly work, or to all taxpayers, to allow others to choose idleness when opportunity is available. Thus, they must accept training opportunities and jobs when offered, or give up their right to the new payments for themselves. No able-bodied person will have a "free-ride" in a nation that provides opportunity for training and work.

The bridge from welfare to work should be buttressed by training and child care programs. For many, the incentives to work in this plan would be all that is necessary. However, there are other barriers to employment.

I propose that funds be provided for expanded training and job development programs so that an additional 150,000 welfare recipients nation. This transformation of the welfare system will set in motion forces that will lessen dependency rather than perpetuate and enlarge it.

A more productive population adds to real economic growth without inflation. The initial investment is needed now to stop the momentum of work-to-welfare and to start a new momentum in the opposite direction.

The costs of welfare benefits for families with dependent children have been rising alarmingly the past several years, increasing from $1-billion in 1960 to an estimated $3.3-billion in 1969, of which $1.8-billion is paid by the Federal Government, and $1.5-billion is paid by the states. Based on current population and income data, the proopsals I am making today will increase Federal costs during the first year by an estimated $4-billion, which includes $600-million for job training and child care centers.

The "start-up costs" of lifting many people out of dependency will ultimately cost the taxpayer far less than the chronic costs — in dollars and in national values—of creating a permanent under-class in America.

From Welfare to Work

Since this administration took office, members of the Urban Affairs Council, including officials of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Department of Labor, the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Bureau of the Budget, and other key advisers, have been working to develop a coherent, fresh approach to welfare, manpower training and revenue sharing.

I have outlined our conclusions about an important component of this approach in this message: the Secretary of H.E.W. will transmit to the Congress the proposed legislation after the summer recess.

I urge the Congress to begin its study of these proposals promptly so that laws be enacted and funds authorized to begin the new system as soon as possible. Sound budgetary policy must be maintained in order to put this plan into effect—especially the portion supplementing the wages of the working poor.

With the establishment of the new approach, the Office of Economic Opportunity will concentrate on the important task of finding new ways of opening economic opportunity for those who are able to work. Rather than focusing on income support activities, it must find means of providing opportunities for individuals to contribute to the full extent of their capabilities, and of developing and improving those capabilities.

This would be the effect of the transformation of welfare into "workfare," a new work-rewarding system.

Firsts for the Nation

For the first time, all dependent families with children in America, regardless of where they live, would be assured of minimum standard payments based upon uniform and single eligibility standards.

For the first time, the more than two million families who make up the "working poor" would be helped toward self-sufficiency and away from future welfare dependency.

For the first time, training and work opportunity with effective incentives would be given millions of families who would otherwise be locked into a welfare system for generations.

For the first time, the Federal Government would make a strong contribution toward relieving the financial burden of welfare payments from state governments.

For the first time, every dependent family in America would be encouraged to stay together, free from economic pressure to split apart.

These are far-reaching effects. They cannot be purchased cheaply, or by piecemeal efforts. This total reform looks in a new direction; it requires new thinking, a new spirit and a fresh dedication to reverse the downhill course of welfare. In its first year, more than half the families participating in the program will have one member working or training.

We have it in our power to raise the standard of living and the realizable hopes of millions of our fellow citizens. By providing an equal chance at the starting line, we can reinforce the traditional American spirit of self-reliance and self-respect.

Nixon Tells Welfare Aims

President, who declared: "We [illegible] families with dependent children," a program we propose to replace. The Federal Government shares the cost, but each state establishes key eligibility rules and determines how much income support will be provided to poor families.

The result has been an uneven and unequal system. The 1969 benefits average for a family of four is $171 a month across the nation, but individual state averages range from $263 to $39 a month.

A new Federal minimum of $1,600 a year cannot claim to provide comfort to a family of four, but the present low of $468 a year cannot claim to provide even the basic necessities.

The new system would do away with the inequity of very low benefit levels in some states, and of state-by-state variations in eligibility tests, by establishing a federally financed income floor with a national definition of basic eligibility.

The Role of States

States will continue to carry an important responsibility. In 30 states the Federal basic payment will be less than the present levels of combined Federal and state payments. These states will be required to maintain the current level of benefits, but in no case will a state be required to spend more than 90 per cent of its present welfare cost.

The Federal Government will not only provide the "floor," but it will assume 10 per cent of the benefits now being paid by the states as their part of welfare costs.

In 20 states, the new payment would exceed the present average benefit payments, in some cases by a wide margin. In these states, where benefits are lowest and poverty often the most [illegible] the payments will [illegible] substantially. For five years, every state will be required to continue to spend at least half of what they are now spending on welfare, to supplement the Federal base.

For the typical "welfare family" — a mother with dependent children and no outside income—the new system would provide a basic national minimum payment. A mother with three small children would be assured an annual income of at least $1,600.

For the family headed by an employed father or working mother, the same basic benefits would be received, but $60 per month of earnings would be "disregarded" in order to make up the costs of working and provide a strong advantage in holding a job.

The wage earner could also keep 50 per cent of his benefits as his earnings rise above that $60 per month. A family of four, in which the father earns $2,000 in a year, would receive payments of $960, for a total income of $2,960.

For the aged, the blind and the disabled, the present system varies benefit levels from $40 per month for an aged person in one state to $145 per month for the blind in another. The new system would establish a minimum payment of $65 per month for all three of these adult categories, with the Federal Government contributing the first $50 and sharing in payments above that amount.

This will raise the share of the financial burden borne by the Federal Government for payments to these adults who cannot support themselves, and should pave the way for benefit increases in many states.

For the single adult who is not handicapped or aged, The new approach would end the blatant unfairness of the welfare system.

In over half the states, families headed by unemployed men do not qualify for public assistance. In no state does a family headed by a father working full-time receive help in the current welfare system, no matter how little he earns. As we have seen, this approach to dependence has itself been a cause of dependency. It results in a policy that tends to force the father out of the house.

The new plan rejects a policy that undermines family life. It would end the substantial financial incentives to the desertion. It would extend eligibility to all dependent families with children, without regard to whether the family is headed by a man or a woman.

The effects of these changes upon human behavior would be increased will to work, the survival of more marriages, the greater stability of families. We are determined to stop passing the cycle of dependency from generation to generation.

The most glaring inequity in the old welfare system is the exclusion of families who are working to pull themselves out of poverty. Families headed by a non-worker often receive more from welfare than families headed by a husband working full-time at very low wages. This has been rightly resented by the working poor, for the rewards are just the opposite of what they should be.

The new plan would create a much stronger incentive to work.

For people now on the welfare rolls, the present system discourages the move work. The new plan on the contrary, would provide a supplement that will help a low-wage worker—struggling to make ends meet—achieve a higher standard of living.

For an employable person who just chooses not to work, neither the present system nor the one we propose would support him, though both would continue to support other dependent members in his family.

However, a welfare mother with pre-school children should not face benefit reductions if she decides to stay home. It is not our intent that mothers of pre-school children must accept work. Those who can work and desire to do so, however, should have the opportunity for jobs and job training and access to day care centers for their children; this will enable them to support themselves after their children are grown.

A family with a member who gets a job would be permitted to retain all of the first $60 monthly income, amounting to $720 per year for a regular worker, with no reduction of Federal payments. The incentive work in this provision is obvious. But there is another practical reason: going to work costs money.

Expenses such as clothes, transportation, personal care, Social Security taxes and loss of income from odd jobs amount to substantial costs for the average family. Since a family does not begin to add to its net income until it surpasses the cost of working, in fairness this amount should not be subtracted from the new payment.

After the first $720 of income, the rest of the earnings will result in a systematic reduction in payments.

Proposed Welfare Shifts

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 11 — If adopted by Congress, President Nixon's welfare reform proposals would work as follows on three key groups among the nation's poor:

UNEMPLOYED FAMILIES

Present Program

A typical case under the program of families with dependent children involves Federal and state support of an unemployed mother and three children. Such a family now gets a monthly check ranging from an average of $38.05 in Mississippi to $249.75 in New York. Of those amounts, the Federal share differs according to how much the state contributes, but in no case is it higher than $128 a month.

Nixon Proposal

Would set a national standard payment of $1,600 a year to every unemployed family of four—a figure that amounts to $133.33 a month. States would be expected to continue supplementing the Federal payment, adding onto it at least 50 per cent but no more than 90 per cent of what the state now contributes. In Mississippi, a monthly payment could jump from $38.05 to as much as $139.63. In New York, despite the changes, the monthly payment would remain about the same.

WORKING POOR

Present Program

There is no provision to supply welfare aid to a family in which someone holds a job. This is true even though many such families have incomes far below the $3,300 amount regarded as poverty level.

Nixon Proposal

The working poor would also be guaranteed a basic annual income of $1,600. The first $720 a year of their earnings would be disregarded, so that a family now receiving paychecks totaling $720 a year would have an annual income of $2,320. For every dollar earned above $720, the $1,600 Federal grant would be reduced by 50 cents. A family with $2,000 annual earnings would receive $960 in Federal funds, for instance. If the family earned $3,000, it would get $460 from the Government. A family earning $3,920 a year would no longer be eligible for relief support.

BLIND AND DISABLED

Present Program

The combined Federal-state system of support for the aged, blind and permanently disabled works on a formula under which the Federal share per month to an individual is $31 of the first $37 in benefits, plus as much as 65 per cent of the remaining amount set by the state as a standard. In no case is the Federal share more than $75 a month and, in practice, individuals get as little as $40 in one state under aid to the aged and as much as $145 in another state under aid to the blind.

Nixon Proposal

Would set a minimum national standard of $65 a month for the aged, blind or disabled in all states. The Federal Government would provide the first $50 and half of the $15 additional. It would also contribute one-fourth of any amount above $65.

provided. It would not be fair to those who willingly work, or to all taxpayers, to allow others to choose idleness when opportunity is available. Thus, they must accept training opportunities and jobs when offered, or give up their right to the new payments for themselves. No able-bodied person will have a "free-ride" in a nation that provides opportunity for training and work.

The bridge from welfare to work should be buttressed by training and child care programs. For many, the incentives to work in this plan would be all that is necessary. However, there are other barriers to employment.

I propose that funds be provided for expanded training and job development programs so that an additional 150,000 welfare recipients can become jobworthy during the first year.

Manpower training is a basic bridge to work for poor people, especially people with limited education, low skills and limited job experience. Manpower training programs can provide this bridge for many of our poor. In the new manpower training proposal to be sent to the Congress this week, the interrelationship with this new approach to welfare will be apparent.

I am also requesting authority, as part of the new system, to provide child care for the 450,000 children of the 150,000 current welfare recipients to be trained.

The child care I propose is more than custodial. This Administration is committed to a new emphasis on child development in the first five years of life. The day care that would be part of this plan would be of a quality that will help in the development of the child and provide for its health and safety, and would break the poverty cycle for this new generation.

The expanded child care program would bring new opportunities along several lines: Opportunities for the further involvement of private enterprise in providing high quality child care service; opportunities for volunteers; and opportunities for training and employment in child care centers of many of the welfare mothers themselves.

I am requesting a total of $600-million additional to fund these expanded training programs and child care centers.

The new system will lessen welfare red tape and provide administrative cost savings. To cut out the costly investigations so bitterly resented as "welfare snooping," the Federal payment will be based upon a certification of income, with spot checks sufficient to prevent abuses.

The program will be administered on an automated basis, using the information and technical experience of the Social Security Administration, but, of course, will be entirely separate from the administration of the Social Security Trust Fund.

The states would be given the option of having the Federal Government handle the payment of the state supplemental benefits on a reimbursable basis, so that they would be spared their present administrative burdens and so a single check could be sent to the recipient. These simplifications willsave money and eliminate indignities; at the same time, welfare fraud will be detected and lawbreakers prosecuted.

This new departure would require a substantial initial investment, but will yield future returns to the

I have outlined our conclusions about an important component of this approach in this message: the Secretary of H.E.W. will transmit to the Congress the proposed legislation after the summer recess.

I urge the Congress to begin its study of these proposals promptly so that laws be enacted and funds authorized to begin the new system as soon as possible. Sound budgetary policy must be maintained in order to put this plan into effect—especially the portion supplementing the wages of the working poor.

With the establishment of the new approach, the Office

fects. They cannot be purchased cheaply, or by piecemeal efforts. This total reform looks in a new direction; it requires new thinking, a new spirit and a fresh dedication to reverse the downhill course of welfare. In its first year, more than half the families participating in the program will have one member working or training.

We have it in our power to raise the standard of living and the realizable hopes of millions of our fellow citizens. By providing an equal chance at the starting line, we can reinforce the traditional American spirit of self-reliance and self-respect.

which he described a retooling of domestic policies.

The President will explain his plans for job training and sharing of Federal tax revenue with states and cities in messages to Congress tomorrow and Wednesday.

Although there was little new in Mr. Nixon's message on welfare today, it confirmed the Administration's plan to eliminate Federal food stamps for welfare families. Instead it called for "an orderly substitution of food stamps by the new direct monetary payments."

$1,600 Income Urged

The Administration contends that poverty families should be guaranteed an annual income of $1,600 and should be funneled into the job market through expanded work training efforts. The purchase of food would come out of the basic relief support, which would be supplemented by the states in most cases.

According to the hunger council, the food stamp cutoff would "pull the rug out from under some 87 per cent of the 6,478,000 welfare poor" currently under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children system.

Mr. Kramer said the current combination of welfare payments and food stamps provided more net income to the majority of relief clients than they could hope to receive under the welfare reform plan in most states. He said the exceptions were Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, South Carolina and Texas, plus Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands.

According to Mr. Kramer, the impact would be even more detrimental on the poor should Congress adopt the more liberal food stamp program urged in May by Mr. Nixon.

Mr. Kramer said he had worked on the statistics all wekend and issued the council's statement without clearing it with its 20 members. But he aded that he spoke for the council, which is headed by Dr. Alfred Haynes of Johns Hopkins University and includes Walter P. Reuther, president of the United Auto Workers, and the Rev. Ralph David Abernathy, head of the Southern Christian Leadership Council.

The council was formed last January to focus public attention on hunger and to seek, as its motto states, "to assure every American family an adequate diet."

Mr. Kramer urged the Administration to rethink its posttion on food stamps and to allow families to continue to participate in the stamp program until the welfare system could guarantee an annual income "three or four times as great as proposed."

Otherwise, he said, Mr. Nixon's proposal will "force families to choose between food stamps and Nixonian welfare

Mr. Kramer's statement contrasted with that of the President, who declared: "We have it in our power to raise the standard of living and the realizable hopes of millions of our fellow citizens.

In essence, the President's welfare package would set higher national standards of support for welfare families and for individuals receiving aid to the aged, blind or permanently disabled.

It would add 12.4 million persons to the 10 million now on welfare rolls. The additional people are members of families now disqualified by many states because an unemployed male lives in the home or because a parent has a job in which he can barely eke out a living.

Mr. Nixon proposes to "stop the momentum of work-to-welfare and to start a new momentum in the opposite direction" by linking relief to job training programs. All unemployed welfare parents—except mothers of pre-school children—would be required to enter a work training class or accept a "suitable" job to remain eligible for assistance.

In his message to Congress, Mr. Nixon sought $600-million to develop child care centers to aid working mothers. He said they would care for some 450,000 children.

The plan will end "blatant unfairness" of the present system by setting national standards, he said. At present, welfare aid to a family of four varies from $39 a month in Mississippi to $263 a month in New Jersey.

The President also said his proposal would provide aid to those who fill out forms and would thereby eliminate much of the "red tape" and "welfare snooping" that angers the poor.

Frauds Will Be Curbed

At the same time, he said, "welfare fraud will be detected and lawbreakers prosecuted." The Administration plans to issue monthly relief checks through the Social Security Administration, where computerized procedures and spot checks could quickly detect fraud.

Despite Senator Nelson's assault on the reorganization of the Office of Economic Opportunity, its director, Donald L. Rumsfeld said the changes would put the full commitment of the President behind the drive to reduce poverty.

Programs developed by the antipoverty agency will be "spun off" to Federal agencies, he said, in the same way the President shifted the Job Corps to the Labor Department and the Head Start program to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

The President said: We must become pioneers in reshaping our society, even as we have become pioneers in space. We must show a new willness to take risks for progress a new readiness to try the untried." willingness to take risks for progress, a new readiness to and thereby guarantee their continued poverty."

NIXON'S NEW DEAL

For more than six months, Richard Nixon bided his time, husbanding his domestic program until even his friends wondered whether he had any to offer, harvesting the rancor of liberal critics who thought they spied a rightward drift in what little motion they could detect. Then last week, in a brisk 35 minutes of national television time, he unlimbered a set of reforms so sweeping that even some of his own Republican Cabinet officers were left gasping for conservative breath, and some of his sternest foes had to hark back to the heyday of Democratic activism for a comparable summons to innovation in social policy.

In a single speech, the President proposed a thorough overhaul of the nation's welfare system that would establish a national minimum level of support for the first time and more than double the number of persons eligible for assistance; he advocated a tax-sharing program in which the Federal government would remit part of its revenue directly to the states and cities; and he called for major revisions of job-training programs that would shift considerable power to local communities and states.

To be sure, Mr. Nixon's proposals reflected the delicate blend of complexion and cosmetics—a careful balance of substance and rhetoric designed to appeal to as many groups as possible—that is his special political style. Here, the Federal government would take over power from the states; there, the states would win new powers from Washington. (This latter shift, the President proclaimed, heralded the dawn of "the New Federalism," a slogan whose capital letters and triple repetition during the speech bore telltale signs that it was perhaps being groomed to succeed the Great Society, the New Frontier and the New Deal.) Mr. Nixon took pains to reassure conservatives that his welfare plan did not contain a "guaranteed income," but nevertheless it seemed to offer just about all the ingredients of that long-standing liberal dream.

'Great Leap': The President's proposals astonished many liberals by their scope and by the fact that Richard Nixon was their creator. "I'm both amazed and pleased," applauded Walter Heller, John Kennedy's chief economic adviser and a pioneer advocate of Federal welfare minimums. "I'm surprised they moved this far this fast." Some Johnson Administration veterans stared enviously at plans thought too radical in their time. Campaign supporters of Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy spotted causes that their own candidates had championed. "It's the great leap forward," exulted Mr. Nixon's Democrat-in-residence, urban-affairs adviser Daniel P. (Pat) Moynihan, with understandable enthusiasm if slightly unfortunate allusion.

And indeed, it was the finest hour in a much-buffeted six months for Pat Moynihan and HEW Secretary Robert Finch who, with crucial support from Labor chief George Shultz (page 19), devised and defended the key reforms. One other Administration figure glowed with justifiable pride in his role in the affair. Richard Nixon, who overruled the majority of his Cabinet and the Vice President in supporting the welfare plan, confided to a friend his conviction that "Tory men with liberal principles are what has enlarged democracy in this world."

'Failure': Mr. Nixon's liberal principles, shaded with a bit of residual Toryism, were best displayed in his welfare proposals. The present system, he observed, is "a colossal failure," an "antiquated, wheezing, overloaded machine" that "breaks up homes ... often penalizes work ... robs recipients of dignity ... and grows"—at the staggering rate of almost 10 per cent a year. The most clanking cog in the machine is the $2.5 billion program of "Aid to Families With Dependent Children," condemned by liberals because it induces men to leave home (in 26 states its benefits are unavailable to families that include an able-bodied man), and criticized by conservatives because it seems open to wholesale abuses and accounts for nearly two-thirds of the nation's entire welfare caseload, now totaling 9.7 million persons.

AFDC, under the President's plan, would be scrapped altogether and replaced by a "family assistance system" that would guarantee a basic minimum income to all families in all of the 50 states. The rate would be $500 a year for each of the first two family members (whether husband and wife, mother and child, or father and child), plus $300 apiece for each additional child. Thus a family of four with no outside income would receive $1,600 a year.

This would represent a gigantic boon to the poor in states such as Mississippi, which currently pays an annual average of only $468 to a family of four under AFDC, and nineteen other states whose welfare levels fall below the national floor that Mr. Nixon proposed (map). Welfare payments in the 30 states that already offer as much or more than the Nixon plan would remain at their present level, but treasuries in those states would benefit from a Federal pledge that Washington would pay at least 10 per cent more of their total welfare allocation than it does now.

Balloons and breakthroughs

The new system not only would raise benefits in the low-welfare states, but it would also remove administration of relief payments from their often capricious hands, installing it instead in the highly efficient Social Security Administration. "This system," exclaimed one high-placed White House aide in a momentary departure from the rhetoric of the New Federalism, "will no longer expose the poor to random, punitive administration of county, state and local governments."

Another feature was even more important and went far toward explaining how so seemingly radical a plan could win the approval of so thoroughly Republican a President as Mr. Nixon. Each head of a household receiving the new Federal benefits (unless she was a mother with a pre-school child) would have to take a job or enlist in a job-training program, provided a suitable one was available. This requirement, in the eyes of Mr. Nixon, for whom the will to work "is part of the American character," absolved his plan from the sin of a "guaranteed income." "A guaranteed income," he said, "would undermine the incentive to work; the family assistance plan that I propose increases the incentive to work."

The Nixon plan would bring twenty states up to minimum payment of $1,600 a year for a family of four

The most tempting incentive to work—and perhaps the most pioneering provision in the new system—was Mr. Nixon's proposal to allow the "working poor," people with low-paying jobs that do not raise them above the poverty level, to keep part of their welfare in addition to their outside income. For years, critics of the welfare system have complained that it actively discourages the indigent from starting work, because any wages they might earn would simply be subtracted from their welfare checks, leaving them with no net gain. To correct this fault, the new plan would permit a person on welfare to keep $720 a year of outside earnings with no reduction in his welfare. For each dollar earned above $720, his welfare check would be reduced by only 50 cents, until his combined earnings and welfare payments reached $3,920 (for a family of four). Beyond that point he would leave the relief rolls.

Cures: In addition to his welfare plan, Mr. Nixon proposed some drastic cures for the ills of the job-training program ("a terrible tangle of confusion and waste") and the Office of Economic Opportunity ("a confusion of roles and . . . a massive attempt to do everything at once"). OEO would be converted to "a laboratory agency," a proving ground for "new approaches to the solving of social problems." Once a social experiment showed its worth, it would be "spun off" to some other agency.

Job-training projects would be gradually turned over to state and city governments to administer while the Federal government continued to supply the funds. "That way," Mr. Nixon said, "they can better be adapted to specific state and local needs." Skeptics who doubted some states' ability—or willingness—to manage this program noted that the President had left an escape clause: if a state mishandled its training funds, control of its program would revert to Washington. But, Mr. Nixon stressed, "the only way to bring about decentralization is to do it, and this is the place to begin."

An even more promising avenue of decentralization was the plan to return Federal tax dollars to the revenue-starved states, "with a minimum of Federal restrictions on how those dollars are to be used" but with a percentage earmarked for the cities. At first, this rebate would be modest: it would not begin until 1972, and then at the rate of only $1 billion a year. "But the principle will have been established," the President said, "and the amounts will increase as our budgetary situation improves."

Caution: This financial caution ran through Mr. Nixon's entire package. Confronted with a budgetary squeeze which one White House adviser pronounced "just awful," the President clearly tailored his proposals for maximum visual impact with minimum immediate cost. Although the price tag for welfare reform was expected to total about $4 billion in the first year, the program could not begin before January 1971.

And before Congress ever reaches a vote, the reforms are certain to face a stormy passage of controversy and debate. Already several liberal Democrats were complaining that the welfare changes did not go far enough, and even some Republicans from high-welfare states objected that low-welfare states would get a windfall under the plan while the others, where the financial strain of welfare was greatest, would get hardly anything at all. South Dakota Sen. George McGovern raised some awkward questions about the future of the food-stamp program, which seemed to be swallowed up in the family assistance plan. And Rep. Wilbur Mills, all-powerful chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee which screens all revenue legislation, announced he was dead set against Federal revenue-sharing with the states.

Big Week: But the criticism on specifics was outweighed by applause for the program's ambitious reach, and Mr. Nixon was clearly pleased with his week's work. In addition to his landmark social proposals, he had sent Congress a trim mass-transit plan, watched approvingly while the House passed a major tax-reform package (NEWSWEEK, Aug. 11) and conferred with visiting West German Chancellor Kurt Georg Kiesinger on the ticklish problems of East-West relations (page 38). To top it off, the Gallup poll reported that the President's national popularity, which dipped to 58 per cent in mid-July, had soared back to its high of 65 per cent following the moon landing and his round-the-world trip.

As luck would have it, Mr. Nixon's biggest week in office fell just a year after his biggest week out of it: his nomination at the GOP convention in Miami Beach. Two hundred party chieftains and campaign veterans sneaked into the White House Rose Garden for a surprise party complete with a convention-like cascade of balloons from the roof above. Then he flew off for a month's vacation at his oceanside villa in San Clemente, Calif., an old Tory buoyed with satisfaction at having put liberal principles on fresh display.

THE MAN WHO HEALED THE WELFARE PLANNERS' SPLIT

In a Cabinet far more careful than colorful, he is the grayest of the gray. His voice trails off into an inaudible whisper. His platform style is so stiff that aides are coaching him in the use of emphatic gestures, but he still hasn't caught the knack. His political ambitions wouldn't fill the bowl of his favorite briar pipe. But when Richard Nixon's ambitious welfare program was stuck in a no-man's-land between warring Administration factions, it was George Pratt Shultz, once the little-known dean of the University of Chicago's business school and now Mr. Nixon's little-known Secretary of Labor, who rode to the rescue with skillful arguments that won the President's favor and, in the process, revealed Secretary Shultz as a surprisingly powerful new force in the field of domestic policymaking.

From the earliest days of the Nixon Administration, welfare reform was a subject of lively interest—and fierce contention. The President's chief House liberals, HEW Secretary Robert Finch and urban affairs adviser Daniel P. (Pat) Moynihan, devised a plan that would set a national minimum level for relief payments and incorporate a device to induce welfare recipients to take jobs. In most states, any money a person may earn is deducted from his welfare check, and obviously few are tempted to start work when it will bring in no extra income. Under the Finch-Moynihan plan, for every dollar a person earned (up to a certain modest minimum) only 50 cents would be subtracted from his welfare allotment.

The Stick: This approach ran head-on into the strict work ethic championed by the President's powerful counselor, economist Arthur Burns. The Federal government, he argued, has no business paying relief to someone who is able to earn money on his own. The way to induce paupers to take jobs, according to Burns's way of thinking, was not the carrot but the stick, not more welfare money but less.

And there, between these two equal but opposite forces, the Administration's welfare program stuck. Down-in-the-mouth GOP liberals began to despair of any reforms at all this year. Then, in mid-May George Shultz stepped in.

As a longtime labor arbitrator, Shultz perceived that the angry impasse would never be broken without a saving of face all round. Accordingly, he threw his weight into the struggle on the Finch-Moynihan side but deftly tailored his arguments to appeal to the "off the welfare rolls and onto the payrolls" predilections of Richard Nixon and Arthur Burns.

Shultz put together a thick document for the President stating a cool, pragmatic case for Federal aid to the "working poor." He pointed out that when a man on welfare takes a job, he is immediately faced with new expenses—for transportation, clothing and food. "You can't expect him to reach into his pocket for these things," Shultz told NEWSWEEK's Tom Joyce, "if his outside earnings are going to be confiscated." What's more, the present system induces poor people to take jobs in which their income goes unreported. "The rich do essentially the same thing," he noted, "by hiring tax lawyers to figure out tax loopholes. Really they aren't doing anything different from a welfare mother picking up pin money." But, he stressed, there is one difference: a job that can be concealed—part-time domestic work or farm laboring—rarely leads to anything better. By allowing a man to keep part of his welfare while starting out at a low-paying job, Shultz contended, the government can begin to help free the poor from the relief treadmill.

The President was so impressed with Shultz's reasoning that he overruled the conservative qualms of most of the Cabinet and the fiscal anxieties of the Budget Bureau. When Mr. Nixon assembled his Cabinet and chief advisers at Camp David last week for final deliberations on the welfare program, only three Cabinet officers favored the plan: Shultz, Finch and poverty chief Donald Rumsfeld. But after a detailed exposition of the program—complete with graphs, charts and pointers—in the paneled dining room of Laurel Lodge, Richard Nixon demonstrated that while he may take ages to make up his mind, once he has made a decision it is well-nigh unshakable.

"How do you know the program will work?" the President was asked. "I don't know," he shot back. "What I do know is the present welfare system is a disaster and I'm not going down that road another step." Where would the money come from? "I'll find the money," Mr. Nixon snapped. The dissenters' lone victory: a change in the name of the program from "family security"—too New Dealish—to "family assistance."

Pleased: For Shultz, the victory was the foremost but not the first sign of Presidential favor. Earlier this year, when Mr. Nixon needed an official to review the controversial system of oil import controls, he selected the Labor Secretary. The word went out that Shultz had pleased his boss more than any of the other Cabinet members who were strangers to Mr. Nixon before their appointment, and the President has increasingly tapped Shultz to represent the White House at public gatherings.

On these occasions, Shultz's disinterestedness seems to shine through his painful diffidence, and those who meet him come away comforted by a surpassing sense of credibility. Occasionally, his obliviousness to public relations is a drawback: friends say he could have avoided a great deal of criticism for closing down Job Corps centers last month if he had explained more forcefully that the surgery was necessary to keep the entire program alive. But, as one longtime associate explains: "Shultz is interested in solving problems, not in placating the yelling crowd." The Labor Secretary is one of Washington's prime practitioners of Richard Nixon's inaugural exhortation to "lower our voices." And even if he sometimes follows that advice too literally for his straining audiences, George Shultz's voice is clearly being heard these days in the high places where it counts.

Behind Nixon's Welfare Showdown

By Daniel Schorr

WASHINGTON

IN COMING MONTHS and perhaps years, it will be debated whether President Nixon's plan for welfare reform represents a progressive concept wrapped in conservative verbiage or a punitive proposal disguised in do-good garb. Not necessarily conclusive, but highly relevant, is the fact that the President himself considers, with some exhilaration, that he has taken a bold, adventurous step in the course of which, for once, he has overridden his more conservative advisers.

It is instructive, first, to review the welfare program's evolution since May, when I wrote in these pages ("The Politics of Welfare," NL, May 12) of an impasse between the proposal of Robert Finch, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, and Daniel P. Moynihan, the President's urban affairs adviser, on the one hand, and the counterproposal of Arthur Burns, the President's economic counselor, on the other. Where the Finch-Moynihan plan urged a uniform Federal standard of assistance to families and incentives to the working poor, Burns favored a system left in the hands of the states, linked to revenue-sharing and stressing a requirement for work or training as a condition for assistance.

For weeks a showdown was avoided while a battle of memorandums proceeded—comments sent to Nixon, distributed to the contestants, countercomments. In this phase, the most significant contribution was the intervention of Secretary of Labor George Shultz with a proposal intended to bridge the philosophical gap between the "guaranteed income" and "work or starve" extremes.

Shultz's recommendation, based on his experience with manpower programs, was a work-or-training requirement, mitigated by exempting not only the handicapped, but also mothers with preschool children. (In the District of Columbia, it is estimated that 80 per cent of welfare mothers have preschool children.) Further, by providing a $30 monthly bonus for those in training, incentive was added to compulsion.

In the Family Security System (later altered to Family Assistance System), meanwhile, the scale of payments for the working poor was drawn so that the first $60 of earnings would be "disregarded"—that is, not deducted from the Federal payment at all—and thereafter 50 per cent of earnings would be deducted. The work requirement thus was retained, but with application to relatively few, and with financial incentives to soften the compulsion.

But the President still vacillated.

Early in June Moynihan, recalling how the Administration's program to combat hunger had been stored away until suddenly pried loose by political necessity, decided that once again the time had come for dramatic pressure. He sent Nixon a memorandum putting the argument in political terms calculated to appeal to the President:

"I am really discouraged about the budget situation in the coming three to five years. I fear you will have nothing like the options I am sure you hoped for. Even more, I fear that the pressure from Congress will be nigh irresistible to use up what extra resources you have on a sort of 10 per cent across-the-board increase in all the Great Society programs each year. This is the natural instinct of the Congress, and it is hard for the President to resist.

"If your extra money goes down that drain, I fear in four years' time you really won't have a single distinctive Nixon program to show for it all. Therefore I am doubly interested in seeing you go up now with a genuinely new, unmistakably Nixon, unmistakably needed program. . . .

"We can afford the Family Security System. Once you have asked for it, you can resist the pressures endlessly to add marginal funds to already doubtful programs. This way, in 1972, we will have a record of solid, unprecedented accomplishment in a vital area of social policy, and not just an explanation as to how complicated it all was."

This, from all accounts, was the turning point. Nixon, apparently accepting the argument that one important new program of his own was politically more valuable than the expansion of previous programs, issued directives to stretch out or reduce existing projects. And he prepared to unfold his new welfare scheme.

The President planned his announcement for the week of July 14—before leaving on his round-the-world trip. But there were further complications, including now the alarm of Cabinet officers and agency heads who felt their programs were being shortchanged in favor of an untried and controversial venture.

The final discussion, therefore, was put off until Nixon's return and was held, with some acrimony, at a full-dress Cabinet session at Camp David, Maryland, on August 6—two days before the already advertised Presidential address on radio and television. At this session, only three Cabinet members spoke out for the welfare plan—Secretaries Finch and Shultz, and Antipoverty Director Donald Rumsfeld. Opposed on financial and economic grounds were Secretary of the Treasury David Kennedy, Budget Director Robert F. Mayo and Paul McCracken, chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers. George Romney, Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, was dubious—his was one of the older programs that would suffer. Vice President Spiro T. Agnew was against it.

Nixon had called the Cabinet meeting not for a decision, but simply for a briefing. His mind was already made up. He later told intimates, cheerfully, that had he called for a vote, it would have been eight to four against the plan. When asked who would have been the fourth, in addition to the three Secretaries who had advocated it, he said he thought that Defense Secretary Melvin Laird would have gone along.

IN SEVEN MONTHS in office, it was the first time President Nixon had made a commitment on a major issue in favor of the liberal wing of his Administration against the virtually united opposition of the conservatives. The plan is still, however, not a social reformer's dream, but a piece of social engineering combined with political craftsmanship. In its essence it would deal in different ways with three categories of needy Americans:

1. For the aging and handicapped, it would provide a Federal minimum payment of $65 monthly.

2. For families, it would provide $500 each annually for the first two members, $300 each for children—or $1,600 for a family of four. Able-bodied adults (except mothers with preschool children) would be obliged to accept work or training under penalty of losing their $500 allowance (but not the allowance for their children).

3. For families of the working poor, not now on welfare, there would be supplements to bring them up to the same $1,600 level. And then, as they earned more, there would be no loss of benefits for the first $720 a year, and after that a reduction at the rate of 50 per cent of their earnings. As it would work out, a family of four would have an income of $3,920 before Federal aid ceased.

The plan is being criticized by liberals on two principal grounds. They feel the $1,600 minimum is low, and the work-training provision has an odor of indenture about it.

There are also questions still to be answered—perhaps when the legislative language is written in September. Must a welfare recipient accept any job offered, anywhere? Will the jobs be available, and of what kind? Will there be any recourse for a welfare recipient who is told to rake leaves or to become Mrs. Jones' house servant?

There are other questions. How many states will supplement the bare $1,600 minimum? Is that $1,600 payment to be used as a justification for withdrawing food stamps? And if, as many think, the Administration has underestimated the cost of its venture at $4 billion for the first year, will it be ready to accept a higher expenditure?

Still, despite all these objections and questions, one must not lose sight of some essential advances. This is an effort to Federalize the patchwork welfare system. It would expand coverage from 10 million to 22 million Americans. It would help to erase the invidious line between working Americans and welfare Americans. It does contain the implied commitment to income maintenance for Americans in need. And all this from a President elected by the welfare-hating "forgotten" middle-class American.

Haynsworth Nominate
Conflict-of-Interest Cho

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

SAN CLEMENTE, Calif.—President Nixon, as expected, nominated Federal Appeals Court Judge Clement F. Haynsworth Jr. as an associate justice of the Supreme Court—a choice that isn't popular with Senate liberals.

In announcing the nomination, the Western White House also sought to put to rest a freshly revived conflict-of-interest charge originally leveled at the South Carolina judge in 1963 in connection with a court review of a National Labor Relations Board ruling.

Mr. Haynsworth, chief judge of the U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, would replace Abe Fortas, who resigned from the High Court under fire in May. Judge Haynsworth, along with new Chief Justice Warren Burger, presumably would help move the Court away from the liberal course its majority has pursued in recent years.

White House press secretary Ronald Ziegler said President Nixon feels Judge Haynsworth has "demonstrated judicial temperament, balance, impartiality, and fairness, and he is a man who at the early age of 56 is an emotionally qualified jurist, scholar and intellect."

Liberal Opposition Seen

Judge Haynsworth may face stronger opposition from liberals in the Senate than did Chief Justice Burger, who enjoyed relatively speedy confirmation as President Nixon's first Supreme Court nominee. This time, specific objections to Mr. Haynsworth have come from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the American Jewish Congress and the Americans for Democratic Action. All are unhappy about Judge Haynsworth's opinions in several civil-rights cases before the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals.

With Congress in recess, sentiment among Senate liberals hasn't jelled on whether to let the appointment go through after a round of hostile speeches, or whether to organize a determined fight against the nomination. In a statement, liberal GOP Sen. Javits of New York said he'll wait until the Senate recon-

CLEVELAND — The Chesapeake & Ohio Railway and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad expect to spend $134 million this year for new freight cars and locomotives, Gregory S. DeVine, president and chief executive of the affiliated railroads, said.

Repeal of the 7% investment tax credit might hamper spending at such levels in the future, he added. He noted the two railroads have spent more than $500 million for equipment in the four-year period beginning in 1966.

Mr. DeVine said the proposal in current tax legislation to permit railroads to amortize the cost of new equipment over a seven-year period would be far less helpful than the investment credit.

In 1969, the two roads plan to buy 8,500 freight cars and 100 diesel locomotives.

A Special News Report on People And Their Jobs in Offices, Fields and Factories

LABOR TURNS increasingly disenchanted with the Nixon Administration.

As the President's domestic program unfolds, it lengthens the list of issues on which the AFL-CIO and the White House disagree. The Federation will lobby hard against Nixon proposals to Congress on welfare reform, manpower training, job safety, unemployment insurance. Generally, labor wants strong Federal controls and standards, while the White House places heavy reliance on state action. "Nixon has done very little in a positive way," complains AFL-CIO boss Meany.

Economic policies stir the greatest concern. The Federation worries that high interest rates increase daily the "danger of recession." The AFL-CIO urges the White House and Congress to move quickly to roll back interest rates. Labor chieftains watch glumly as the unemployment rate inches up to 3.6% from 3.3% earlier this year and prices continue to climb, wiping out some of their gains at the bargaining table.

Labor Secretary Shultz escapes blame. "He's a fine gentleman" who's "doing reasonably well," says Meany.

NIXON'S PLAN for compulsory training of welfare recipients faces uncharted problems.

Manpower experts have little experience in moving those on welfare rolls onto payrolls through job-training. The Work Incentive Program, set up last fall by the Labor Department, already has enrolled 90,000 persons. But the first trainees won't be ready for jobs until October. Though Federal officials are pleased with progress so far, they concede they are dealing largely with the most highly motivated relief recipients.

Under Nixon's proposals, state employment agencies probably will be responsible for determining which relief rollers must accept training or lose their benefits. Another likely employment office task: Deciding whether "suitable" work exists. Washington planners worry that the state employment agencies' performance is "very spotty from place to place." Many agencies have been charged with discriminating against minorities.

AUTO INDUSTRY will watch American Motors bargaining for clues to labor's mood.

Negotiators for GM, Ford and Chrysler, who'll tangle with the United Auto Workers next year, hope this fall's talks at AMC will shed light on the union's 1970 plans. Company officials know money will be the big issue. But they're in the dark on other key items, uncertain how much control top leaders will exert over locals. Also unknown is the possible im-

Company officials know money will be the big issue. But they're in the dark on other key items, uncertain how much control top leaders will exert over locals. Also unknown is the possible impact on negotiations of internal politicking to succeed UAW boss Reuther, who turns 62 on Labor Day.

The AMC bargaining will focus on union efforts to recover wage and pension concessions granted in 1968, when the company was still plagued by financial woes. Reuther talks more about leisure time for workers; the union may attempt to broaden the limits on overtime and lengthen vacations at AMC. The company will resist costly demands, arguing that it's barely in the black and remains the poorest profit-maker in the industry.

UAW veep Pat Greathouse, in charge of the AMC talks, is one of three top candidates to succeed Reuther.

LABOR AND TAXES: The AFL-CIO, unhappy with parts of the House-passed tax reform bill, will seek changes in the Senate. It urges Senators to provide "more substantive relief" for middle-income families, strengthen the minimum-tax provisions and "more effectively close the capital gains loophole."

AIRLINES' PACT to provide financial aid when any member is struck will be reviewed by the Civil Aeronautics Board. In March, a CAB examiner ruled the agreement among seven major carriers isn't "adverse to the public interest." But unions contend it worsens labor relations.

DISAPPEARING ACT: A House appropriations panel quietly kills a Nixon Administration request for an additional $2.3 million to provide closer scrutiny of union financial affairs. Gloats a labor man who lobbied against the funds for a beefed-up staff of Federal investigators: "The money just disappeared."

* * *

A MAJOR SETBACK is suffered by the State, County and Municipal Employes Union in representation elections among 137,000 New York State employes. The union won bargaining rights for only 7,000 workers; the Civil Service Employes Association captured the rest. "We really got clobbered," concedes a union official.

PERSONNEL PEOPLE prove harder to find in some areas, especially the East.

The shortage of hiring-firing specialists with one to three year's experience is "critical," says Brentwood Associates, a Newark, N.J., placement firm. It struggles to find one candidate for openings that would have attracted at least seven applicants three years ago. Handy Associates, a New York consultant, estimates demand for top personnel executives is up 30% since 1967. In Atlanta, a lack of staff forces an employment agency to close temporarily one of its two offices.

Executive recruiters blame part of the shortage on personnel management's lack of appeal to the ambitious. "A personnel man rarely becomes president of a company," notes a recruiter. One solution to the shortage: More smaller firms turn to Philadelphia-based R. J. Carroll Associates, which supplies part-time specialists who run personnel programs for a flat weekly rate.

Not all firms feel a personnel-specialist pinch. "Of all our problems," says a Coca-Cola official, "I'd have to rank this as one of the least threatening."

THE CHECKOFF: A dedicated young couple, both members of the United Papermakers Union, showed up for picket line duty in Erving, Mass., at 6 o'clock one recent morning—just 10½ hours after getting married. . . . The Labor Department reports that enrolment in the nation's major manpower programs hit a record 536,000 persons at the end of June.

On the beach: The Sun President scouts the Pacific from the shores of the Western White House

ALIVE AND WELL IN CALIFORNIA

Fellow citizens! God reigns, and the government at Washington still lives!
—James A. Garfield

God reigned on last week, but the government at Washington was actually at San Clemente, Calif.—and, whether or not as a direct result, the man who accomplished the Great Leap Sideways seemed happier in his work than he had ever been. Richard Nixon had packed his golf clubs, his swim trunks, his yellow pads and his Administration and taken the lot along on his vacation on a palmy promontory farther distant from his capital than kings and czars, let alone past Presidents, used to transport their courts. And there, in the sometimes crystalline air of his native California, the President occupied his new Western White House, promulgated the sun kingdom and settled in to enjoy it while it lasted.

His days were sunny indeed. His standing as President was burnished by the afterglow of the Apollo moon voyage, his subsequent world tour and now his imaginative new domestic program—the last an offering that had transformed his and his Administration's image overnight from one of drift to one of bold direction. His Gallup popularity rating, after a brief dip, had bounded back to 65 per cent—matching the high for his seven months in office. There was little on his docket more strenuous than dispatching his welfare, job-training and revenue-sharing messages by remote control to Congress and toasting the Apollo crewmen in champagne at a Rotarian's dream of a banquet in Los Angeles (page 20B). So sure-footed did he feel on the sands of San Clemente that he laid aside his normal diffidence as a minority President and took Congress sharply to task for "taxing less and spending more" in the midst of a perilous inflation.

Flurry: Not even the news that Communist forces had breached the lull in Vietnam with a 100-target offensive (page 33) ruffled the waters around Cotton's Point. "I wouldn't say a little flurry was the end of the lull," said a determinedly optimistic Secretary of State William Rogers with only the earliest communiqués only partially in hand. When subsequent reports made the "flurry" look considerably bigger than it first had seemed, Rogers left the talking to Presidential press secretary Ron Ziegler, who was noncommittal about the enemy attacks ("We're watching them very carefully") but firm on the point that Mr. Nixon still plans to reach a decision late this month on the possibility of withdrawing more U.S. troops. And the betting at San Clemente was that the President would try his best to sit out both the burst of fighting and the hawkish home-front pressures it might generate and go ahead with his second troop withdrawal—this one involving possibly 50,000 men (in addition to the 25,000 he began bringing home in June).

The main domestic business was to send Congress the three interlocking messages detailing the New Federalist work-and-welfare package Mr. Nixon had outlined in broad strokes on national television the week before (NEWSWEEK, Aug. 18). The highlights:

- Message No. 1 covered the President's $4 billion battery of proposals to transform "a [welfare] system frozen in failure and frustration into a system that would work and would encourage people to work." He proposed doing this chiefly by setting a minimum amount for welfare payments ($1,600 a year for a family of four), by requiring able-bodied relief recipients to take jobs or job training and by letting them keep part of their welfare money if they are working at poverty wages. The details, of course, were open to lively debate (page 18)—but few critics quarreled with Mr. Nixon's central judgment ("The present welfare system has failed us") or with his major announced objective: to "stop the momentum of work-to-welfare and . . . start a new momentum in the opposite direction."
- Message No. 2 proposed making sense of the bewildering tangle of 30 separate and overlapping Federal job-training programs by consolidating their administration and gradually turning them over to the states. The object, said Mr. Nixon, would be to "knit together all the appropriate services in one readily available system," so that ultimately a job seeker could go to a single state employment office and be placed in the appropriate program rather than try to sort them out himself. The President suggested a pay schedule for trainees which, by 1973, would come to 50 per cent of the state's prevailing wage, plus $15 a week for each dependent up to six, plus $30 incentive and expense money for welfare recipients—and a bonus of two weeks' pay for those who graduate. He also urged a computerized job bank to match trainees with job openings. The total cost: $3.5 billion a year—with an automatic 10 per cent jump in times of high unemployment.

▪ Message No. 3 outlined a modest beginning on revenue-sharing with state and local governments, starting with $500 million the first year but rising to $5 billion by fiscal 1976 and growing by roughly $500 million more a year thereafter. The money would be doled out with absolutely no strings attached—not even the normal ban on using Federal funds to support segregated programs. The starting payments would be small to the point of irrelevance, but Mr. Nixon's aim was far higher. "This proposal," he wrote Congress, "marks a turning point in Federal-state relations, the beginning of decentralization of governmental power, the restoration of a rightful balance between the state capitals and the national capital."

All Set: One piece of business went conspicuously untransacted—naming a successor to the U.S. Supreme Court seat lately vacated by Abe Fortas. The President himself promised on his arrival in San Clemente that he would announce his man during the week, and word quickly spread through Washington that it would be U.S. Circuit Judge Clement Furman Haynsworth, 56, a moderate-to-conservative South Carolinian who had been the odds-on favorite for weeks (NEWSWEEK, July 28). Even Minority Leader Ev Dirksen confidently predicted his appointment, and the judge himself waited in his chambers in Greenville, S.C., with a stack of thumbnail biographies and check lists of his most important judicial decisions freshly mimeographed for his big day.

It didn't come. Mr. Nixon, for reasons of his own, hesitated over the announcement, and the delay gave Haynsworth's opposition time to form. The NAACP Legal Defense Fund, the American Jewish Congress and liberal Republican Sen. Jacob Javits of New York all decried his mixed (though not immoderate) civil-rights record. (The attacks, Haynsworth protested, were based on positions he took in the 1950s, "when none of us was thinking or writing as we are today.") And critics raked up a conflict-of-interest complaint lodged against him by the Textile Workers Union in a 1963 case—an allegation Haynsworth insisted had been investigated by the Justice Department at the time and thrown out as false. Washington still expected Haynsworth to be nominated this week. But the old certainty now was edged by the memory of how Mr. Nixon hemmed and hawed over nominating Dr. John Knowles, an outspoken liberal, for Assistant HEW Secretary—and gave the doctor's conservative opposition time to abort the appointment.

Yet nothing seemed to mar the Sun President's fun—not even a teasing invitation from a peace group to the Nixons to "bring their sand buckets" and join an all-day sand-castle build-in just down the beach from Cotton's Point. Washington was 2,300 miles distant, God reigned, and the government at San Clemente was really living.

WELFARE:

Second Thoughts

The welfare-reform proposals President Nixon sent to Congress last week were boldly conceived and expertly packaged—but would they sell? The week's omens were mixed. Practically everyone—liberals and conservatives alike—seemed pleased with Mr. Nixon's imaginative main thrusts: setting a national-minimum amount for welfare checks, building in dollar incentives for the poor to work and to keep their families together, streamlining and humanizing the dole by letting the U.S. Social Security Administration take over payments from state and local welfare bureaucracies. Yet the future of the package was clouded by a gathering quarrel over the specifics—and the quarreling, ironically enough, came mainly from liberal reformers who had themselves long advocated the sort of welfare revolution the President was proposing.

Their chief complaints:

▪ The $1,600 minimum annual payment proposed by Mr. Nixon for a family of four is not nearly enough. The Nixon plan's architects figure that the program will ultimately cost $4 billion a year as it is—an estimate that most competent observers regard as exceedingly conservative. They point out, moreover, that $1,600 is only a minimum—that the 30 states which now pay more will be required (with Federal help) to continue doing so. But that seemed cold comfort

THE WHITE HOUSE ON THE PACIFIC

Secretary of State William Rogers came out to walk a grassy slope with the President and report on his 100,000-mile Asian journey. The National Security Council materialized intact to talk high policy atop a bluff commanding the blue-green Pacific. Spiro Agnew was there, and the Pentagon's Mel Laird, and Attorney General John Mitchell. So was the entire topside White House staff, and Bebe Rebozo, and all the Nixons down to the First Dog of the Land, King Timahoe. "We're sort of taking a Western tilt," beamed Richard Nixon, an old Californian who had decided in the first year of his Presidency that you can too go home again—and, sure enough, it looked as if his entire Administration had magically slid across the continent from Washington to the sun-bathed, surf-washed village of San Clemente.

Somehow, mirabile dictu, it got there in working order. The President as recently as June figured that—while he was in residence at his new summer hacienda on Cotton's Point—he could deposit the rest of the government 35 miles up the coast at Newport Beach and commute by helicopter. But some monumental security problems there—and the risks of flying the President back and forth daily—made the Secret Service nervous. So Mr. Nixon simply ordered his "Western White House" operation moved to a neighboring Coast Guard LORAN station, three minutes by golf-cart from his own oceanside digs. It took some doing; construction crews had 28 working days to bulldoze beaches, pave a helicopter

Maddox Calls Welfare Plan Just Peanuts

9-2-69

By CHARLES POU
~~Atlanta Journal~~ Political Editor

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. Even with the offer of two great negotiable commodities—money and peace — President Richard Nixon Tuesday had run into trouble finding universal takers here high in the Rockies where the nation's governors are holding their annual meeting.

With the governors, who like Nixon's general notion of the federal government sharing the tax wealth with local governments, it appeared to be more division on the technicalities of who is to get how much money and how.

But Nixon, who declared Monday night that he has "an effective strategy for peace" to be carried out in the '70s, was greeted outside the plush Broadmoor Hotel here by a crowd of youthful protesters who wanted to know "How, how, how?" They then went into the traditional chant, heard from youth across the land.

" Ho, Ho Chi Minh,
"NLF is going to win."

ON THE revenue - sharing part of his plan to help the nation's ailing cities, Nixon, speaking to the governors at their traditional black-tie state dinner, took up where his chief lieutenants had left off in buttonholing governors for backing of the President's "New Federalism" plan. Nixon called the program, which starts with a guaranteed income of $1,600 for family of four, "an adventure in human advancement."

Gov. Lester Maddox called the $500 million starter proposed by the Nixon administration "peanuts" and indicated he might become interested in helping get the revenue-sharing proposition through Congress only if that figure were doubled. The Georgia governor also expressed his usual fears of more "centralization of government" in Washington and of the wrong kind of poor people enjoying the welfare life even more.

AS HAPPENED two years ago when the governors talked about what to do on Vietnam in an unusual shipboard meeting in the Atlantic, Nixon's peace proposals were not very specific. He said:

"The new strategy for the '70s also requires a strategy for peace. And I pledge to you tonight that we will have an effective strategy for peace.

"This means maintaining defense forces strong enough to keep the peace, while not allowing wasteful expenditures to drain away resources we need for progress.

"It means limiting our commitments abroad to those we can prudently and realistically keep. It means helping other free nations maintain their own security, but not rushing in to do for them what they can and should do for themselves."

HOST Gov. John Love, a Republican, and expected to succeed Tennessee Gov. Burford Ellington as the new conference chairman, told the President before he left:

"We pledge to give you complete support to the program that you have initiated."

Love, who came on the scene three years ago as a political nobody, first to win the Colorado governorship and then almost to become chairman of the conference, generally is viewed as the most likely Republican to attain the largly honorary title. He would be a compromise choice to halt Republican in-fighting. New York Gov. Nelson Rockefeller probably could get the conference chairmanship job, but doesn't want it because he'll be busy campaigning for re-

NEW YORK (AP) — The exact-fare system aimed at ending holdups on the city's 4,285 buses went into effect, but two robbers, not realizing the handicaps, robbed a driver anyway.

They climbed aboard a Brooklyn bus driven by Norman Simington, 41, and demanded money at gunpoint.

election back home in New York through 1970.

Under rules of the 51-year-old conference, the chair title goes from party to party year to year. Next year is the GOP's time, but the other most likely Republican contender, Gov. Ronald Reagan of California, is still privately viewed as a bad actor in some Republican circles.

GOV. REAGAN came about as close as any governor here to sharing Gov. Maddox's basic suspicion of anything that might raise welfare grants. But there were different viewpoints on the Nixon revenue-sharing plan.

Gov. Rockefeller wants the federal government to pick up the entire welfare tab. There was support for this, especially from populous, industrial states which put more into the U.S. Treasury than they get out.

Vice President Spiro Agnew, housing and urban head George Romney and Dr. Arthur Burns, a chief Nixon fiscal adviser, are among those here espousing the "New Federalism" project of the President. Burns agreed with Maddox that the initial $500 million revenue-sharing was smallish, but he pointed out the figure would increase annually with natural revenue growth.

Some governors did not like the proposal of discontinuance of "categorical grants" for welfare, while some did. And there was general apprehension by chief excutives from the Far Western states, where the Buffalo still roam and the people are countable, about the feature of the Nixon proposal which would have allocations based partly on population.

President Nixon came here obviously hoping to get the governors solidily behind him before he formally offers the program to Congress.

"The essence of the New Federalism," he said, "is to help regain control of our national destiny by returning a greater share of control to state and local authorities.

"We have proposed the first major reform of welfare in the history of welfare. Some object to these proposals understandably, as seeming to favor one region over another, or because they give the rich states less than the poorer states. . . . We must think in terms of the people and their needs — wherever they are."

Cost of the Proposals Put at $4-Billion for First Year

By WALTER RUGABER

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 8 — President Nixon unveiled today plans for a sweeping overhaul of the welfare system that would more than double the number of Americans eligible for public assistance.

The President, in a 4,700-word speech to a nationwide television audience tonight, proposed a minimum standard of Federal aid for every needy family with children.

Except for disabled adults and mothers with preschool children, the poor would be required to accept "suitable" employment or participate in a government training program to be eligible for relief.

Mr. Nixon estimated Federal costs of the welfare effort, which would not begin before next July 1, at $4-billion for the first full year. He also outlined a $1-billion program to share Federal revenue with the states.

Rolls Could Expand

Administration officials said that the assistance rolls, which now list six million children and four million adults, could expand under the new program to a total of 22.4 million people.

The plan would encourage—in fact, force—people to work. It would allow those with low-paying jobs to continue to receive some support. It would make eligible all poor families, not just those without fathers.

The main features of the plan, which would require Congressional approval, include the following:

¶A family of four with no outside income, whether it lived in New York or Mississippi, or any other state, would receive a minimum Federal payment of $1,600 a year. The states could supplement that amount.

¶The same family could earn as much as $60 a month, or $720 a year, with no loss of benefits. Beyond that, aid would be reduced 50 cents for each dollar earned until the family's wages reached $3,920.

¶Every recipient would have

Nixon Proposes an Overhaul of Welfare

to register with a local unemployment office and, if employable, would have to accept a job deemed suitable by the Government, or would have to undergo training.

¶The program would be administered by the Social Security Administration, not the state welfare systems, and in many cases the poor would deal directly with Federal officials.

¶Applicants would simply make declarations of need and begin receiving payments, subject to spot checks such as those on income tax returns. This would eliminate delays for petty and sometimes demeaning investigations.

¶The food stamp program, which the Administration earlier this year proposed to expand greatly, would not be available to participants in the new program. It would be mainly available to single persons and couples without children.

¶In addition to Federal rebates under the revenue-sharing arrangement, state and local governments would see the costs of their welfare efforts reduced by 10 to 50 per cent.

The President's proposals would abolish the biggest welfare category, Aid to Families with dependent Children. The three "adult" programs—Old Age Assitance, Aid to the Blind and Aid to the Partially and Totally Disabled—would remain.

But each of them would have a uniform income floor of $65 a month and Federal matching arrangements under which Washington would pay all of the first $50, half of the next $15, and a fourth of anything additional.

Would Reduce Imbalances

The Administration's plan was aimed at a numebr of widely criticized aspects of public assistance that have grown up picemeal since the New Deal.

Among the obvious points, it would tend to reduce the gross imbalances that, for example permit families of the same size and income to receive $263 a month in New Jersey and $39 a month in Mississippi.

This, as Mr. Nixon said, has helped "to lure thousands more into already overcrowded inner cities, as unprepared for city life as they are for city jobs."

The plan would also encourage—in fact, force—people to work. It would allow those with low-paying jobs to continue to receive some support. It would make eligible all pocr families, not just those without fathers.

Urges More 'Workfare'

Mr. Nixon surrounded his proposals with conservative phraseology. Social experiments over the last 30 years or so, he charged, have produced "a bureaucratic monstrosity, cumbersome, unresponsive and ineffective."

"After a third of a century of power flowing from the people and the states to Washington," the President said, "it is time for a new federalism in which power, funds and responsibility will flow from Washington to the states and to the people."

Some of his phrases recalled his campaign speeches of last fall.

"In the final analysis," he said, "we cannot talk our way out of poverty; we cannot legislate our way out of poverty; but this nation can work its way out of poverty. What America needs now is not more welfare but more 'workfare.'"

White House sources said that the proposed legislation to implement the President's proposals would not be sent to Congress until after its return from its summer recess early next month.

Ronald L. Ziegler, the White House press secretary, said that a message on the welfare overhaul would be sent to Capitol Hill Monday.

Mr. Nixon said in his speech that he would also propose a reorganization of the Office of Economic Opportunity to "stress accountability, a clear separation of functions, and a tighter, more effective organization of field operations."

Rumsfeld to See Nixon

He did not disclose the details, but Mr. Ziegler said that Donald L. Rumsfeld, the poverty agency's director, would visit the President at Mr. Nixon's vacation home in California to discuss the changes.

Mr. Ziegler said that a second message would be sent to Congress Tuesday, outlining Mr. Nixon's suggestions on improving the Government's manpower training program and dealing wth the work incentive aspects of the welfare overhaul.

Tonight the President assailed the present manpower effort as a "terrible tangle of confusion and waste," and he promised to organize, decentralize and suit it to business demands.

Specifically, the President said that the Government would offer 150,000 new "training slots" for the heads of families on welfare and would expand day-care centers for young children whose mothers wanted to work.

Finally, Mr. Ziegler said that a message on the revenue sharing plans would be issued on Wednesday.

The immediate Congressional reaction to Mr. Nixon's plans seemed generally favorable. But House and Senate consideration could be quite time-consuming, with liberals pressing for greater assistance levels and conservatives arguing for a narrower effort.

Benefits the States Would Receive

Following, in millions of dollars, are the aid that states would receive from the Federal Government in the form of revenue sharing and the minimum reduction that would be allowed in their present welfare spending with the Federal Government taking over a larger share of the burden:

Welfare Dilemma

Rising Relief Costs Increase Tax Burdens Yet Squeeze the Poor

As Number on Rolls Climbs, Officials Trim Benefits But Budgets Still Mount Pressure From the Militants

9/17/70

By RALPH E. WINTER
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

CLEVELAND — Mrs. Catherine Redrick, who supports herself and her four children on $268 a month in welfare payments, has a new problem.

"I don't know how I can send my kids to school without more money for clothes," she says. The four children "just have tennis shoes to wear, and their other clothes are worn out." Mrs. Redrick is angry because Cuyahoga County, which includes this city, omitted the back-to-school clothing allowance of $24 per child that it paid last year.

But Samuel P. Bauer also has a problem. As the county's acting welfare director, he was aiding 115,000 welfare recipients at the end of the first half, up from 92,000 a year earlier. The county welfare budget has soared to $112.5 million this year from $94.7 million last year. Officials thus omitted the special clothing allowance, which cost a total of $1.5 million last year. They also trimmed some regular monthly cash benefits and diminished spending on home repairs for relief recipients. But even with the cuts, the county had to borrow $3 million to balance its welfare budget.

In Cleveland and across the nation, the welfare squeeze is tightening. Because of the business downturn, a loosening of welfare eligibility requirements and other factors, the nation's welfare rolls have swelled to more than 12 million from 10.3 million a year ago, the Government reports. Federally assisted forms of welfare, including Medicaid, cost the taxpayer more than $12 billion in the fiscal year ended last June 30—double the level four years earlier. In addition, programs paid for by states and localities alone pumped out about $600 million—a 70% rise from 1966—to people ineligible for Federally supported aid.

Increasing Tax Burden

The result is a dilemma. Increasingly, welfare offices try to trim payments. This creates hardships. Yet taxes to support welfare still rise. In Gary, Indiana, for instance, a $92 chunk of the local taxes paid last year by the owner of a $25,000 home and a $4,000 car went to relief, up from $72 only a year earlier, Gary officials say. Because of soaring welfare expenses, Los Angeles and Milwaukee taxpayers are in line for property tax increases. Mainly to pay higher relief costs, some Ohio counties have recently introduced a 0.5% sales tax.

Taxpayers increasingly balk. "There's too many people on welfare who ought to be working," says a hard-hatted construction worker at a Cleveland building site. "It's not the taxpayer's responsibility that they have so many

Taxpayers increasingly balk. "There's too many people on welfare who ought to be working," says a hard-hatted construction worker at a Cleveland building site. "It's not the taxpayer's responsibility that they have so many kids they can't support them."

The welfare squeeze has put some states, counties and cities in a bind. Though the Federal Government pays about 52.5% of all welfare costs, states and local governments split the remainder in varying proportions, depending on state law.

Trouble for Texas

Welfare spending in Texas is growing so fast it will soon become literally unconstitutional. The state constitution has an $80 million annual limit on welfare payments. Such outlays were budgeted at $75 million in the year ended Aug. 31. But if current levels of compensation are to be maintained, disbursements will climb to $96 million this fiscal year and $123 million next year, officials forecast.

Texas recently had to borrow $13.5 million from a state construction fund reserve to tide over existing welfare programs until the legislature meets early next year. The lawmakers will then consider an emergency appropriation. Even if this is approved, which is far from certain, a state referendum must be held to remove the constitutional welfare payments ceiling.

If Texas can't get the added funds, it plans to cut Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) payments to an average of only $18 per person monthly from the current $28.21, state officials say. AFDC mainly supports abandoned unmarried and married mothers and their children.

Texas' current monthly payment is already well below the national average of about $46 per AFDC recipient, and cutting it will pose hardships. Yet the number of Texas AFDC recipients soared to 271,000 at the end of the first half from 164,000 a year earlier. Either the pie gets bigger or the slices get smaller, officials say.

Stopgap Measures

Other states are already adopting all kinds of stopgap measures. A few months ago Pennsylvania postponed a showdown on welfare financing by adopting an eight-month budget ending next Feb. 28. The move, in effect, drops the politically sensitive problem onto the laps of the governor and legislature to be elected in November. The $318 million in the eight-month budget roughly equals welfare spending for the full 1970 fiscal year that ended June 30.

The state of Washington has sharply cut certain types of aid. For some recipients the allowed number of state-paid office visits to doctors was cut to one a month from two. The state has also discontinued child day-care payments for families with two healthy adults. (Officials had discovered they were paying child care costs for some low-income married college students.)

Tight budgets are forcing many welfare departments to skimp on staff. San Francisco's 1,400-employe welfare department recently asked for 348 new staff members to cope with the rising caseloads. It got none. Ironically, such skimping sometimes lengthens welfare rolls because overworked employes may tend to grant requests too easily just to keep the lines moving, relief officials say. "It works to the benefit of borderline applicants," a West Coast welfare official admits.

But court rulings have knocked out some economy moves. Federal courts, for instance, forced Texas to change a policy of paying additional benefits per child for only five children; before the court ruling, the policy gave a mother with nine or 10 children the same payment as a mother with five offspring.

Indeed, court rulings are also lengthening relief rolls. For instance, a recent Supreme Court ruling bars states from requiring that welfare recipients live in a state for a given period of time before qualifying for relief. Also, following court and administrative rulings, states can no longer stop AFDC payments if a mother starts to live with a man. A California court ruled this summer that an alcoholic may be granted welfare solely because he's an alcoholic.

But there are other reasons underlining the growth in welfare rolls and the welfare budget squeeze. The biggest factor: The number of mothers and children receiving AFDC leapt to 7.86 million last March (the latest figure, from 6.48 million a year earlier. Over the past five years, the number of AFDC recipients has increased 80%. The growth reflects continued deterioration of family structure and changing morality, welfare experts say.

Today's high unemployment hurts, too. "When it's Administration policy to have higher unemployment, it's sure to be reflected in higher assistance rolls," asserts Arthur Silverman, deputy director of the Milwaukee County Department of Welfare in Wisconsin. Unemployment among unskilled workers runs nearly double the overall jobless rate. Many unskilled workers don't hold a job long enough to earn unemployment benefits. Others don't get enough unemployment insurance to pay their bills, and still others find the insurance expires before they find a new job. All these categories are likely prospects for welfare.

The recession sometimes aggravates other problems and adds to the relief rolls. Take Robert, a mustached machine operator here in Cleveland who drank too much and drifted from job to job. He and his plump wife, Anne, didn't get along too well in the best of times. But with the business downturn, there's no job for a man with Robert's erratic work record and heavy drinking. After Robert lost his job and couldn't find another, he argued violently with his wife, beat her and left home. Anne filed for divorce, but Robert can't pay alimony or child support. So Anne and the two children joined the welfare rolls. They cost the taxpayer $175 a month plus any medical care that might be needed.

Even though some hard-pressed states and cities are now trying to trim individual payments, these individual outlays have risen steadily over the long term. That $46 average monthly payment per AFDC recipient represents a rise of nearly 50% from five years ago.

As a result of twice-yearly adjustments for cost-of-living increases in Illinois, "monthly grants have been going up like clockwork," says a spokesman for the state's Welfare Department. Largely because of these cost-of-living increases, the Illinois welfare budget for the year that began July 1 climbed 30% from the previous year while the number of recipients is currently 18% higher than a year ago.

Many poor people who were once too proud or too ill-informed to apply for welfare are doing so now. The stigma once attached to "living off the dole" is declining, welfare experts say.

"If Sen. Eastland isn't uncomfortable taking a Government cash payment for his farming, some folks figure they shouldn't be uncomfortable about using welfare services," says a Cook County (Chicago) Welfare Department spokesman. Farms in which the Mississippi Democrat has an interest received Federal subsidies totaling $133,000 in 1968, the latest figure available. Department of Health, Education and Welfare figures show that an AFDC family in the same state receives an average monthly welfare payment of $47.25, or $12.04 a person. Thus, welfare rights groups argue that the recipients have little cause for shame.

The same groups now aggressively seek out the poor and urge them to apply for benefits. While taxpayers increasingly demand smaller welfare budgets, militant welfare rights groups increasingly demand bigger relief payments—sometimes violently. Recently a Washington, D.C., group that wanted more aid smashed welfare office windows before police could break up the crowd.

Welfare Reform

Fight For Welfare Jobs Succeeding

The Public Employee

December, 1970

Welfare reform and how to protect the jobs of AFSCME social workers were discussed at a U.S. Senate hearing by (l. to r.): George A. Wiley, Executive Director, National Welfare Rights Organization; AFSCME President Jerry Wurf; Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D.-Minn.) and Sen. Fred Harris (D.-Okla.).

Washington, D.C.

A major break has developed in AFSCME's determined campaign to protect the jobs of thousands of incumbent state and local welfare workers who would be affected by the adoption of the Nixon Administration's Family Assistance Plan.

The Administration, through Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare Elliot L. Richardson, has agreed to a proposal to protect the jobs and some benefits of local and state employees who would be transferred to the federal payroll in administration of the plan.

The proposal was one of 10 submitted by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D-Conn.) in a late-breaking effort to save the Family Assistance Plan from defeat.

AFSCME President Jerry Wurf said that while the Ribicoff amendments provided some protection for AFSCME members employed in welfare departments, "they are far from adequate."

The union's drive to guarantee that no social service employee would lose his job, collective bargaining rights, or any benefits gained through collective bargaining, or become caught in a squeeze between local, state, and federal agencies in administration of the plan, was continuing as The Public Employee went to press.

New Bill Promising

A measure co-sponsored by Sen. George McGovern (D-S. Dak.), Sen. Fred Harris (D-Okla.), Sen. Harrison Williams (D-N.J.), Sen. Hiram Fong (R-Hawaii), Sen. Charles Mathias (R-Md.) and other senators incorporating the AFSCME position would make the Family Assistance Plan more palatable to AFSCME members.

The union's program to secure adequate protection for social service workers under any Federal legislation reached a climax in October when more than 1,200 AFSCME members from eastern and midwestern states took their messages to Capitol Hill. They visited their senators and representatives, as well as federal agencies, to persuade them to include in any Federal measure clauses that would protect the jobs and working conditions of the tens of thousands of experienced social service employees.

They also used their visit to impress upon Congressmen the urgent dangers of reduced client benefits and services that are encompassed in some sections of the bill.

The bill at that time made no provision to continue the employment of thousands of social service employees, nor for the protection of the pension rights, fringe benefits, salary levels and decent conditions of work that had been gained through years of AFSCME collective bargaining.

Wurf, in testifying before the Senate Finance Committee which is considering the bill, noted that AFSCME favored the Family Assistance Plan in principle.

AFSCME, he told the senators, "has sympathy for the major underlying concepts of this legislation," but was seriously concerned with the "continuing but unfulfilled assurances from this Administration that it would provide protection for current employees.

AFL-CIO Supports AFSCME

The AFL-CIO Executive Council joined AFSCME in its campaign to both protect the jobs of social service workers and to increase the base annual income of $1,600 for a family of four that is included in the legislation.

The Family Assistance Plan measure is now linked to the Social Security bill. The Senate Finance Committee has agreed to provide a minimum-income guarantee of $130 a month for all persons over 65, as well as the blind and disabled welfare clients, and $200 a month—or $2,400 a year—for all aged, blind and disabled couples. Some of the funds would come from state welfare programs.

Those who would be eligible for the $1,600 payment could also receive up to $864 in food stamps, plus possible supplemental state payments.

Both AFSCME and the AFL-CIO are fighting to guarantee that all working members of families that would qualify for federal welfare assistance would be paid no less than the highest federal minimum wage for covered employment, or the prevailing wage for a particular job, whichever is greater.

The Ribicoff Amendment has sought a minimum wage payment of $1.60 an hour for all welfare recipients who are placed on jobs, including the public service jobs that the called for in the legislation. Richardson rejected the $1.60 figure, proposing a $1.20 minimum wage instead.

No 'Coolie' Labor

Neither AFSCME nor the rest of organized labor will accept the lower minimum wage proposal on the grounds that it would provide a pool of "coolie" labor for cheap employers to draw upon.

He said the lower minimum wage for the poor would cause a condition of indentured servitude.

Ribicoff also attempted to raise the $1,600 minimum and to eliminate the requirement that women with school-age children be forced to work. Both proposed amendments were rejected by the Administration.

Among the other amendments that Ribicoff proposed and the Administration accepted are those that would:

- State a definite nationwide income goal for the poor.
- Require states to keep their current welfare benefit levels for families with some income. The original bill would have permitted a reduction in benefits.
- Restore the special high-benefit program for families with jobless fathers.
- Earmark $150 million in federal funds for public service jobs for welfare recipients.
- Follow court decisions on obligations to stepchildren, a factor in determining whether a stepchild qualifies for aid.

Welfare Reform

would be involved and currently indications suggest that all the issues cannot be resolved.

The main punitive power of SRS is the withholding of Federal welfare funds, which, of course, can penalize poor people in each of these states. The Administration has proposed in its pending welfare legislation that the HEW department be empowered to bring legal suits to force the states to live up to Federal requirements.

This step would speed the long administrative proceedings that can take six months or more and also would avoid fund withholding in some circumstances.

Despite political difficulties, Mr. Twinen doesn't show any signs of backing off from his campaign to obtain compliance with Federal welfare laws. One of the agency's next concerns is to prevent states from requiring stepparents to contribute to the support of needy children unless state law clearly establishes this requirement for all step-parents.

Various Other States Cited

This campaign to prevent states from selectively making step-parents support children currently on the welfare rolls could affect Nebraska, Vermont, South Dakota, New Jersey and Iowa. In addition, the HEW agency has reported that several other states aren't complying with Federal welfare law.

These include Delaware, which hasn't increased its maximum limits on welfare grants; Tennessee, which by state law requires investigation of the eligibility of adult welfare recipients that, the HEW agency says, must be ended; the District of Columbia, which won't permit a full-time working mother to receive welfare aid even though her job pays her so little that she would otherwise qualify for public assistance, and New York, which maintains a differential in the amount of welfare payments between New York City and upstate jurisdictions on grounds the city has higher living costs.

Nixon Faces Major Conflicts on Welfare And Federal Funds With Several States

1/11/71

By JONATHAN SPIVAK
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—Although the Nixon Administration knocked down, at least temporarily, a politically embarrassing conflict with California over Federal welfare regulations, it faces serious struggles with other states.

The Health, Education and Welfare Department already is embroiled in welfare conflicts, posing possible cutoff of Federal funds, with Arizona, Indiana, Nebraska, Missouri and Connecticut.

In addition, HEW's Social and Rehabilitation Service is pushing vigorously for compliance by other states with highly detailed and technical welfare requirements that could lead to additional conflicts.

The welfare agency's basic purpose is to force the states to live up to requirements of welfare law, particularly new provisions passed on by Congress in 1967. Its major weapon is the threat of withholding Federal funds from any welfare programs in which states fail to meet Federal requirements. "Fundamentally, what is at stake is a respect for the law," maintains an SRS expert.

In the case of California, a threat by SRS Administrator John W. Twinen to withhold $684 million in Federal funds from the California program of aid to families with dependent children was rescinded abruptly. Late last week, Mr. Twinen officially warned the state that the cutoff would take effect April 1 because California hadn't increased its legally imposed maximums on grants to eligible families to keep pace with cost-of-living increases, as required by the 1967 amendment to Federal welfare law.

Hectic last-minute communications between California's Gov. Reagan and HEW Secretary Richardson led to a lifting of the Federal ban. Gov. Reagan promised to seek review by the state's supreme court of lower court decisions that he claimed were interfering with his ability to raise the maximum set by the legislature on California welfare payments. In return, Mr. Twinen rescinded his April 1 cutoff deadline.

Early Action Is Sought

However, the SRS administrator insisted that he was seeking quick action by California to solve the welfare conflict and that he wouldn't hesitate to reimpose the cutoff if the state didn't make progress within the next few months.

Whatever the outcome of the California conflict, HEW soon will be engaged in another bitter Federal-state fight with Arizona that also promises to produce political embarrassment for the Nixon Administration with its conservative Republican supporters.

The Arizona welfare fight centers on a Federal demand that the state appoint advisory committees for its welfare programs containing at least one-third welfare recipients or representatives. The state has adamantly refused, insisting that Federal welfare law, itself, doesn't contain this requirement. An HEW hearing examiner has recommended that Federal welfare funds, totaling about $35 million, be cut off.

Sen. Goldwater (R., Ariz.) has attacked the HEW action in a Senate speech. He castigated the HEW agency for "callous disregard for Constitutional requirements laid down for agency activities" and argued that a Federal fund withholding would be "cruel, irrational and just plain stupid."

SRS Administrator Twinen is expected to rule Jan. 26 on the Arizona issue and signs point to a Federal-fund withholding effective April 1. However, Mr. Twinen is considering a public hearing, probably in Phoenix, over which he would preside and at which all parties would present their arguments.

Supreme Court May Decide

An Arizona cutoff probably would be quickly appealed by the state to the courts and HEW specialists think the issue could go all the way to the Supreme Court. The heart of the conflict would be the department's authority to issue regulations, such as the advisory committee requirement, based on general language in the Social Security Act for "proper and efficient" administration of welfare programs.

Federal experts say the Arizona test could have far-reaching consequences. If the state upsets the department on the advisory committee requirement, many other states with other objections to detailed HEW welfare regulations could pursue the same course.

If the Federal Government prevailed, the decision would strengthen the HEW agency's hand in forcing states to follow the department's interpretation of welfare law and eliminate the need for increasingly detailed legislation by Congress.

Even before the Arizona battle, Mr. Twinen is likely to order a cutoff of funds on April 1 to Indiana and Nebraska. Neither state has, as yet, adjusted its maximum limits on welfare grants—the issue involved in the California conflict because of state legislative restrictions. Mr. Twinen's ruling is due next Monday and would involve $25 million in welfare funds for Indiana and $8 million for Nebraska. However, before the cutoff date the state legislatures might be able to take action.

Missouri Conflict Differs

A different conflict is brewing with Missouri over its welfare program. Federal officials contend the state isn't living up to a requirement that it cannot reduce spending on welfare Medicaid programs and is failing to provide payments to eligible welfare recipients within 30 days of their application for grants.

It's possible that Congress, itself, may remove the restriction on lowering welfare Medicaid payments by states that the lawmakers passed a few years ago. But the 30-day payment issue, a provision of the HEW department's welfare regulations, can't be compromised.

Federal officials say the problem is particularly troublesome in St. Louis where, they assert, it takes local welfare authorities three to 3½ months to get checks to recipients. The problem also exists in Kansas City, they say.

A hearing on the issue is scheduled Jan. 19 in Missouri. The state's main difficulty is that major administrative changes, including the hiring of more workers, could be required to meet Federal payment deadlines, SRS officials say.

The Federal conflict with Connecticut involves a long list of issues affecting most of the state's welfare programs. These include the state's asserted failure to protect the privacy of recipients from unauthorized welfare investigations. Mr. Twinen is likely to be required to rule on a cutoff to Connecticut sometime this spring; about $99 million in Federal funds would

The news of the tragic accident in the Finley mine which occurred near Hyden, Kentucky on December 30, 1970, spread quickly across the nation. This grim happening quickly drew words of sympathy from public officials from the president on down. Private indviduals, clubs and civic organizations, locally and in many states across the country, responded with contributions to the families of the 38 men who died in the mine explosion.

We have since learned that these 38 men are listed among approximately 250 other coal miners who died in mining accidents during 1970. Unlike the 38 miners, those who have died in single accidents have gone relatively unnoticed. The difference between the response of the death of 38 and the single accidents of over 200 men who have died in single accidents is illustrative of the lack of response that the rest of the country has traditionally shown toward Appalachian people. The men who died in the Hyden explosion were strong, hard working mountain men who had no other choice for livelihood in their home region. Young men growing up in Appalachia, much as these 38 men, go into the mines and risk the fate of these 38 miners, the likelihood of contracting black-lung or silicosis, or, leaving the region for employment in urban areas where, in late 1970, they were not needed and usually ill-prepared in vocational or educational training.

During the history of coal mining, Appalachian families have lost thousands of breadwinners and suffered untold grief from disabling accidents and black-lung diseases. The only honorable occupation open to a majority of able bodied men in the area is coal mining. Yet, the region has little material benefits to show for either the human suffering or the removal of its natural resources. The most tragic of all tragedies will be to let the memory of these 38 miners die and let things return to a normal status quo. If any permanent improvement and if the sons of the miners who died on December 30, 1970, are to have better opportunities, renewed work for changes and economic development must be made NOW. New job opportunities, new educational programs, public facilities and the recognition of the unique character of Appalachian people and culture must be established now.

It is for these reasons that the Jackson/Clay Community Action Group, Inc. is publishing this special issue of the Roadrunner as a memorial to the miners who died at Hyden. Let us hope that other memorial issues of this or any other paper will never again be necessary.

Why men go to die in the coal mines

The COURIER/COURNAL & TIMES Sunday, January 3, 1971 "The Passing Show" Section F

COMMENT / By JOHN FETTERMAN

SOON NOW, all 38 of the men killed in the explosion Wednesday in a coal mine near Hyden, Ky., will be buried in the cold, rocky, gray soil of the hollows where they lived. All the concerned officials, the scurrying press, the mine officials, the police, will be gone. Then will emerge the true nature of the people who live in the mountains.

Conditioned by the hard land on which they live, the hopeless economy of their region, their deep fundamentalist religion and their penchant for fatalism, they will begin to steel themselves for the next disaster. And they know it is sure to come.

Hurricane Creek in Leslie County, where the men died, will become in time like Hellier, Hot Spot, Premium — and coun[illegible] other remote coalfield communities. For years to come, men on Hurricane Creek will tell of those who "died under the hill." And worried parents then will repeat the litany of the coal country: "I don't want any of my boys to work in the mines."

But many of their boys will work in the mines. The mines offer most of the jobs. In fact, almost all of the jobs that are available unless one has the connections to secure empolyment with the school board or the highway system. Not many do. The black veins of coal, worth much more per ton now than ever before, will be mined, and East Kentucky history shows that no amount of oratory in Hyden, Frankfort or Washington over safety standards is going to stand in the way of the frenzied production of coal.

All of this—the relentless, primitive, inviolate rhythm of events in the coal country—will become apparent. And the people will accept it. They will accept it just as they have accepted all the extraordinary hardships which have beset them since their ancestors came to that wild and rugged land more than a century ago.

But for a few days now, the inevitable will be put aside in the minds of the people. They will weep and pray in their little churches and their ministers—many of them lay preachers—will invoke their simple faith in long, hypnotic, sing-song sermons; sermons delivered with fiery determination, sermons punctuated by shrieks of grief and supplications of the bereaved.

The families, including the visiting kinfolk who have escaped to Chicago, Detroit and Cincinnati, will gather for a few days at the tiny mountainside cemeteries and reflect upon their grim legacy. The graves—there will be 38 new ones now—will be carefully tended and watched for as long as a single family member remains alive. The graves alone will remain unspoiled in a land where destruction of terrain is a way of life. The people have often been promised a better life in a world which is to come after death. And they hope it is true. Already, thousands of them wait in the graves for the fulfillment of resurrection.

Those still living hope with a great fervor, because they know the coal is still there waiting to lure more of them to their deaths—or to mangle and cripple them. The coal is patient with a patience which far outmatched even the amazing enduring patience of the hill people. Black and rich, the coal has lain there in seams up to six feet thick for nearly 300 million years. And there are boilers that must have it.

So men, perhaps with the same names as those who died Wednesday—Bowling, Collins, Hoskins, Sizemore, Couch—will go to wrest the coal from its bed of rock, and will die in the attempt.

The COURIER-JOURNAL Thursday Morning, Dec. 31, 1970 "Bodies Recovered after blast" 39 miners feared dead near Hyden

Dust and debris cover bare trees as families wait

By DAVID HAWPE
Courier-Journal Staff Writer

HYDEN, Ky.—The forlorn tragedy of coal mining struck Leslie County yesterday as an explosion killed at least 15 men and left 24 others apparently trapped and feared dead.

State police at the scene gave the figure of 15 dead early last night, but Gov. Louie B. Nunn's office said in Frankfort that 38 men had been killed.

However, Stanley Finley, a co-owner of the Finley Coal Co. mine, said 39 men were underground when the blast erupted, apparently about a half mile from dual mine openings.

The worst coal mine disaster in Kentucky occurred August, 1917, when 62 persons were killed in a gas explosion at the No. 7 mine of West Kentucky Coal Co. near Clay. In 1945, on Christmas Day, 31 men died in an accident at the Straight Creek Mine in neighboring Bell County, 20 miles from Hyden.

Sounded like a tornado

Rescue teams began removing bodies from the driftmouths of the Finley mine on Hurricane Creek about 7:30 p.m. as families of the miners waited nearby.

Everett Bartley, Hazard office supervisor for the Kentucky Department of Mines and Minerals, said the disaster "was an explosion. . . . Either they were shooting the coal in there or it was a blown cable."

The explosion occurred about 12:20 p.m., when the day shift was operating sections on both the left and right of the main shafts.

One man who was standing outside the mine opening when the explosion erupted, said he saw "a bale of smoke and dust as big as a mine hole."

"It blowed it right off through there," the man said, pointing toward the hillside on the opposite face of the hollow. Dust and mine debris coated the bare trees on the incline.

"It was like you might hear a tornado coming," the man concluded.

The Finley mines, designated as No. 15 and No. 16, are interconnecting, and the U.S. Bureau of Mines considers that both were involved in the tragedy. However, the bodies that had been recovered early last night were brought from the No. 15 mine area.

In federal inspections this year, the mines were cited for a variety of mine-safety law violations.

In June a federal inspector found an "imminent danger" because of loose coal and coal dust accumulations and ordered the men taken from No. 15. It resumed operations three days later after deficiencies were corrected.

Before leaving for the site of the tragedy, Gov. Nunn said the federal Bureau of Mines and the state Department of Mines and Minerals were making a full scale investigation. "Every agency of state government is standing by to assist the families in this tragic hour."

Finley was asked if there was any hope that some of the miners might have survived the blast. "I wouldn't think so," he replied.

State police began blocking KY. 80 at its intersection with the mud road which winds down into the pit of Hurricane Creek toward the mine.

Cars lined KY 80 more than one mile in either direction.

Mine mouth road blocked off

Families and friends of the trapped miners walked slowly down the brown strip of Hurricane Creek Road, holding onto each other and talking in low tones. One pregnant woman was supported by three of her friends as she rushed along the sloppy roadway toward the mine, crying, "I have to get there. I have to get there. He's down there."

At the mine site itself, police cordoned off the road to the mine mouth, and bystanders built a bonfire to warm themselves.

Groups of women stood wavering in the firelight, pushing at their eyes with crumpled handkerchiefs.

The mother of one miner trapped 2,500 feet inside the mountain collapsed under the weight of her grief, and had to be placed in the back of a jeep. She moaned and gripped the hand of friends who sat beside here.

At the fire, the wife of one miner cried over and over, "Oh, God. Oh, God. Oh, God." She wavered back and forth and was caught by a young man in a green Army shirt, who snuggled her close to him.

Widows of mine victims file for survivor benefits

THE MOUNTAINSIDE funeral procession for Howard and Holt Couch was one of nine such processions, several of them for multiple services, for victims of last week's mine disaster near Hyden, Ky. Hearings will be held tomorrow to attempt to determine the causes of the tragedy.

MANCHESTER—Widows of the miners who lost their lives in the Hurricane Creek disaster last week walked through light drizzle yesterday, as they approached the ordeal of filing for various kinds of survivor benefits.

The families of 28 victims sat stony-faced in straight-backed chairs at the Manchester VFW Club, and heard William Boleyn bring condolences from President Richard Nixon.

Boleyn, representing the executive office of the President, said Nixon sent, "his very deepest sympathy. I am here at the personal concern of the President."

"No one can bring back your loss, but the President has directed that each of the agencies that can provide help do expedite that help as quickly as possible."

Probable maximum: $19,700

The list of officials on hand was impressive, including Joe Lambert, representing Sen. John Sherman Cooper. From Frankfort came Merritt Deitz, commissioner of economic security; Boots Young, commissioner of labor; Frank Rochelle, Kentucky Program Development Office director, and Lynn Frazier, state Office of Economic Opportunity director.

Although the disaster occurred near Hyden, 35 miles away, most of the victims were from the Manchester area. The last five were to be buried today in Clay County.

The next of kin asked no questions of the speakers, but dispersed quietly for processing at nearby tables. Their benefits could include Social Security, workmen's compensation, Veterans Administration aid and even food stamps if there is a need.

The families also learned that each probably was eligible for a total of $19,700 in workmen's compensation benefits if the husband or breadwinner was killed in the Hurricane Creek disaster last Wednesday. There was no official estimate of how many children and wives were affected, but figures ranged from 150 to 200.

J. Keller Whitaker, director of the state program, said the maximum death benefit is $48 weekly for 400 weeks plus $500 for burial expenses.

After six months of benefits for a widow, the board could give her the remainder in a lump sum, but Whitaker said "the board is rather jealous of turning a widow loose with a lot of money, especially when she has children."

Social Security sent office managers from Hazard, which serves the Leslie County families, and Corbin, which serves the Clay County families.

Donald Robinson, Social Security manager from Corbin, said the families of 28 victims completed their applications for Social Security survivors benefits.

"We were able to get almost all of the documentary evidence we needed, such as birth certificates, marriage licenses and the like," Robinson said.

Regular employment

He said the other 10 families apparently failed to come to the meeting because services for some of the men were held yesterday, or because high water rose over some roads.

Rain pelted into valleys that looked like huge fog pits yesterday, causing most drivers to operate with their lights on. Water burbled in brown paths over low spots in some remote roadways.

Statistics gathered yesterday indicated that there were 10 miners from Leslie County and 28 from Clay County who lost their lives in the explosion at the Finley mines.

The blast left a total of 97 miner children. Only five of the 38 men who died were single.

"Where there is a widow and children, there will be a burial benefit of $255," Robinson said. "There also will be a monthly survivors benefit, with the amount depending upon the deceased average wage over a period of time."

He said the survivors would receive a full benefit check for the month of December, although the men died on Dec. 30.

"The minimum benefit in any case would be about $200 a month," he said. "And the maximum would be near $400."

Robinson said the coal company had cooperated completely with Social Security officials: "They sent in office staff on New Year's Day and worked up all this information on the wages of victims. The mine owner was quoted as saying the men's wages were upwards of $24 a day, and the wage reports that we saw bear out that figure.

"Another thing conspicuous about the wage records was that the employment of these men was regular," Robinson said. "Often in coal mining a man will work a month or two and then be laid off. These men apparently worked regularly."

Miners' blood again stains U.S. coal

IT IS HARD to be calm and dispassionate when discussing a mine disaster. The impulse is to cry out in bitter anger, to echo the anguish of the women huddled at the mine mouth in yet another re-enactment of this hideously familiar mountain tragedy. Who does not recoil, who can but weep and rage inwardly to see them there again, clutching each other, moaning their pleas into the cold, damp air, their eyes fixed on the black, flame-torn hole in the hillside into which their men went and from which they will not return—not until the grim-faced rescue squads, eyes sick with what they have seen, bring the burned bodies out.

So the graves are dug and the blasted bodies buried, and the crippled lives of the survivors go on. Truly, the blood of miners is on the coal the nation burns and the power it produces, as though a miner shrieks his final agony each time a light comes on. Yet somehow the massive suffering never seems to translate itself into the safety laws and enforcement that might end the slaughter. With each new tragedy indignation rises and the public demands reforms. But interest ebbs and anger dies before the sobs of those left are stilled in the dank hollows of the coal country.

Inspection disclosed dust

Fixing blame will not bring back the 38 miners killed this week in an explosion of Leslie County's Finley Mine. But it might save other lives, and there seems to be blame enough to go around. All signs point to an accumulation of coal dust, apparently ignited by a spark. The one federal inspection of the mine conducted last year found it so dangerous and full of coal dust that it was shut down until corrections were made. Other inspections were required by law, but they were not made, a reflection of the fact that the U.S. Bureau of Mines has neither money nor trained inspectors to do its job.

Part of the blame lies squarely with President Nixon. He fired John O'Leary, the only Mines Director in the past 20 years to try to make mines safe. He gave half-hearted support to the new mine-safety bill, but he waited months to name a new director, and then named a man of uncertain background, qualifications and policies, who is handicapped by having too few inspectors to enforce the law.

Nor is there compelling evidence that the administration of Governor Louie Nunn is more concerned than Washington. In 1969 Robert K. Jones of the state Health Department began a study of safety conditions in Kentucky mines. Early in 1970 he submitted to H. N. Kirkpatrick, Commissioner of Mines and Minerals, his report showing that some Kentucky mines contained 67 times as much coal dust as considered safe by federal laws. Many if not most Kentucky miners, said the Jones report, work in dangerous mines, under conditions that violate the 1969 federal safety law.

But somehow the Jones report was not released until two months ago, rather than in the spring, when it might have enabled the legislature to pass supporting enforcement laws. Why it was bottled up so long only Mr. Kirkpatrick and Governor Nunn can explain. Not that explanations, from Frankfort or Washington, will help the endangered men who mine our coal. They and those who wait each day for them to come out of the mines can only hope that some day the lives of the men who dig America's coal will become as valuable and important to their country and its government as the stuff they dig.

About The Miners

Arnold Wagers

Arnold Wagers was 35 years old. He spent 18 years in the mines, mostly in Clay County. He had worked about 5 years at Finley's. His family includes his wife, Juanita, and children, Gloria Ruth, 14, David Wayne, 7, and twins, Kenneth and Dennis, 3. He lived on Chop Bottom in Clay County. Juanita Wagers said of her husband, "Arnold played the guitar. He had 3 guitars. He also loved to fish. In the summer, it will even be more lonesome." Arnold's brother, Armond was also killed in the accident.

Armond Wagers

Armond Wagers was 40 years old. He was in the mines for the first time when he was 14. He had worked at Finley's for 2 or 3 years. He was born in Clay County on February 5, 1930. He lived on Chop Bottom. His family includes his wife, Elva, and children, Roy, 24, Charles, 21, Brenda, 18, Glenn, 18, Larry, 15, Janet, 12, Wanda, 12, Lonnie, 10, Russell, 8, Kathy, 6, and Chester Lee, 4.

Elmer White

Elmer White was 23 years old. He was born on September 9, 1947. He was born in Clay County and lived on Chop Bottom. He had spent only 4 weeks at Finley's. He leaves his wife, Brenda, and son, Charles Lynn, 5 months. His family also includes 15 brothers and sisters. His wife, Brenda, also lost her father and uncle in the disaster.

Decker Whitehead

Decker Whitehead was 46 years old. His birthdate was July 11, 1924. He was 16 years old when he started working in the mines. He had worked at Finley's for 6 years and was a mine foreman. His family includes his wife, Lula Smith Whitehead, and five children, Maudie, 27, Betty Faye, 25, Mona, 23, Cecil, 22 and Roy, 19. There are also three grandchildren, Melissa, Melina, and Daniel Ray Henson. His son, Cecil was wounded in Vietnam last year and will be getting a medical discharge this month. Mrs. Whitehead said, "We want to thank everyone for all the food and flowers. Also thanks to the Island Creek Church, Rev. John Hornsby, Rev. R. C. Flynn, Rev. Lonnie Thompson, Cincinnati, and Rev. Cecil Hooker." He lived on Island Creek, Clay County

Wilbert Smith

Wilbert Smith was 33 years old. He was born in Clay County on April 10, 1937. He had spent 15 years in the mines, 4 of those years at Finley's. He had also worked in Indianapolis for awhile. He and his wife, Betty Faye had been married 5 years. His parents are Theo and Ruile Smith of Goose Rock. His wife, Betty Faye, also lost her father, Decker Whitehead, in the disaster He lived in Lyttleton Clay County.

Jeff Spurlock

Jeff Spurlock was 41 years old. He had spent 24 years in the mines. He had worked at Finley's for 5 years or more. His family includes his wife, Barbara, and four daughters, Alice Sue, 17 Joan, 15, Kathy, 13 and Debbie, 12. Barbara Spurlock also lost her brother, Theo Griffin, in the mine disaster. His home was on Paces Creek, Clay County, Ky.

Theo Griffin

Theo Griffin was 28 years old. He had only worked in the mines for 4 months. For 9 years he had been employed in Louisville, but he wanted very much to come back home to work. He leaves his wife, Martha and daughter, Sandra Carol, 6 years old. He lived on Paces Creek, Clay County, Kentucky.

Delbert Henson

Delbert Hesnon was 19 years old. He had only worked in the mines since August. He had his best friend, Teddy Bush, who was also killed, started working together. He leaves his parents, Bertha and Estill Henson; 4 sisters, Gracie, Oma, Ellen, and Cornella and 6 brothers, Carl, Thomas, Asher, Charles, Lloyd, Jr., and Sammy. He lived on Elk Creek in Clay County.

Teddy Bush

Teddy Bush was 21 years old. Like Delbert Henson, he worked only 5 months in the mines. His parents are Taylor and Susie Bush. There are also 3 brothers, Jerry, Kenneth and Wayne. He lived on Elk Creek in Clay County.

Billy J. Bowling

Billy J. Bowling was 24 years old. He had worked in the mines since he was 16 years old. He had spent 2 years at Finley's. His wife is Mary Katherine Bowling and children are Deborah Kay, 4, Donna Lynn, 3 on Jan. 18, and David France, 4 months. Billy was born in Clay County and lived on Land Log. His parents are Robert Lee and Dorothy Bowling.

Price Henson

Price Henson was 38 years old. He had spent 19 years in the mines and 12 or 13 of these at Finley's. He was born in Clay County and lived on Patch Branch. His family includes his wife, Litha and children, John, 16, Kelly, 14 Louise, 13, Michael, 9, Ben, 7, Denise, 3, and Tina Lynn, 9 months. Besides her husband, Litha Henson lost her brother, Billy J. Bowling and her brother-in-law, Arnold Sizemore.

Arnold Sizemore

Arnold Sizemore was 34 years old. He had spent 16 years in the mines, most of these at Finley's. His family includes his wife, Bobbie Lee and children, Randy Dwayne, 9, Charles Glenn, 7, and Willa Gail, 2. He lived on Big Creek in Clay County. His parents are Delores and Barrett Sizemore. He was born in Fishtrap, Kentucky. Like Litha Henson, Bobbie Lee Sizemore also lost a brother-in-law, Price Henson, and a brother, Billy J. Bowling.

George Holland

George Holland was 41 years old. He had spent 23 years in the mines. He worked 6 years for Finley's. He and his wife, Alvie, had been married 20 years. He leaves 3 daughters, Helen, 19, Wilma Jean, 17, and Wanda, 13. He was born in Leslie County. Levi Holland is his father. He and his family lived on Elk Creek in Clay County.

Walter Hibbard

Walter Hibbard was born May 3, 1929 to Rufred and Ida Hibbard. He had spent 24 years in the mines. He had been at Finley's for 1 year and was a mine foreman. His wife is Mae Grubb Hibbard. His children are Ronnie, 17, Gary, 14 Sharlene, 11, Wanda Faye, 9, and Peggy Sue, 7. He had lived in Clay County all his life. His wife, Mae, said the following about her husband, "We had a happy life together. My loss is heaven's gain. He was a Christian man that really loved his family." He also leaves 4 sisters and 6 brothers. Mrs. Hibbard also wishes to thank everyone who helped.

Fred Collins

Fred Collins was 18 years old. He had worked in the mines for 3 years. He spent all 3 years at Finley's. He had quit school to help the younger children in the family according to his parents. His family includes: his parents, Dewey and Mae; sisters, Kathy Holland, Carlene Turner, Bethel Gray, Evelynene and Bessielene; and brothers Raymond and Dewey, Jr. Another brother, Kenople, was also killed in the disaster. He made his home on Elk Creek, Clay County.

Kenople Collins

Kenople Collins was 26 years old. He had worked in the mines 8 years, mostly at Finley's. He was born in Clay County and lived on Elk Creek. He leaves his wife, Mildred, and two children, Sherry Anne, 4, and Kenny Wayne, 3. His wife is expecting another baby the 1st of February.

Earl Phillips

Earl Phillips was 45 years old. He had spent 25 years in the mines and had been working at Finley's since 1962. He and his wife, Dorothy, and children lived on Patch Branch, Clay County. His children include, Marietta, 24, Joyce Ann, 23 Patricia, 20, Margaret, 17, Charlotte, 12, Joseph Earl, 10, Deborah Kaye, 9, and Eddie Dean, 7. There are also 4 grandchildren, Rhonda Joyce Gregory, Estill Douglas Gregory, Eddie Wayne Mills and Jimmy Ray Mills. Earl Phillips was a World War II veteran. He served in France and Belgium, was wounded in action and reported missing in action for 2 days.

Russell Morgan

Russell Morgan was 33 years old. He had spent 12 years in the mines, 5 of these at Finley's. He leaves his wife, Mossie and two children, Deobrah, 12 and Darrell, 6. He lived on Elk Creek in Clay County. His family also includes his parent, Laura and Ueal Morgan and 6 brothers and 2 sisters.

Grover Bowling

Grover Bowling was 33 years old. He had worked at Finley's Mines for 7 years. He was born in Clay County and lived in Manchester. His family includes his wife, Barbara, daughter, Denia Lee, 8, and his mother, Ida Bowling.

Carl Ghent

Carl Ghent would have been 32 years old on January 9. He had worked in the mines 17 years and at Finley's for 7 or 8 years. He lived on Billy's Branch in Clay County. His wife is Ruby Ghent and his three children are Veda Ann, 10, Jeffrey Lane, 7, and Tammie Lynne, 3. Carl was born in Clay County, the only son of Lola and John Ghent. He had 6 sisters.

Lawrence Gray

Lawrence Gray was 30 years old on November 29. He had worked in the mines at least 10 years, 2 years at Finley's. His family includes his wife, Nancy and his children, Charlotte, 9, and Wade, 7. Lawrence was born in Clay County. He leaves his parents, Ballard and Ollie Gray and 3 sisters and 3 brothers. He lived on Elk Creek in Clay County.

Stanley Roberts

Stanley Roberts was 44 years old. He was born in Clay County. He had worked in the mines for 25 or 26 years in Clay and Leslie Counties. He had been at Finley's for 2 years. He and his wife, Bonnie, had been married 23 years. They have four sosns; Stanley Wayne, 21, and in the Marines, William Thomas, 19, Delbert, 18 and Randy, 12. He lived on Greasy Branch, Clay County.

Lester Harris

Lester Harris was 35 years old. He was born in Pigeon Roost, Kentucky on March 17, 1935. He had worked in the mines 18 years, mostly in Clay County. He had spent 2 to 3 years at Finley's. His family includes his wife, Edith, and 3 sons, Glenn, 13, Eddie Dean, 10, and Timmy Dwayne, 7. He made his home on Chop Bottom in Clay County. His wife said of her husband, "He always said he wished he had a better education so he wouldn't have to work in the mines. He wanted his boys to get a good education so they wouldn't have to work in the mines."

Kermit Hubbard

Kermit Hubbard was 39 years old. He was born in Clay County. He had spent 23 years working in the mines. He had been at Finley's for 6 or7 months. He'd been hurt several times in mine accidents. He and his family lived in Manchester. His wife is Geneva Hubbard and his children are John Clifford, 15, Joyce Anne, 14, and Jimmy Lee, 11. Geneva Hubbard said of her husband, "He always had time to help other people. He was a Christian man. After he worked all day in the mines, he would come home and always help others."

James Minton

James Minton was 27 years old. He was born on March 12, 1943 in Indiana. He came to Clay County when he was about a year old. He had worked in the mines about three years, and at Finley's for 9 months. He was a veteran having served in the Army for three years. His family includes his wife, Geraldine and his daughter, Sondra, 2 years old. His wife said that James loved music. He played a guitar and sang. He had performed in music groups on many occasions. He lived in Manchester.

Frank Hoskins

Frank Hoskins was 19 years old. He had worked at Kentucky Mountain Coal Company for awhile and at Finley's for 2 months. He was born on Double Creek in Clay County. His parents are Radar and Celia Hoskins. Also one brother David and one sister Margie, survive. His brother, Ben Hoskins, was also killed in the explosion. His wife is Brenda Carol Hoskins and son is John Radar, 9 months. He lived on Elk Creek in Clay County.

Ben Hoskins

Ben Hoskins was 24 years old. He had worked for Finley's for 7 years. He was born in Clay County and lived on Elk Creek. He is survived by his wife and 4 children, Francis, Margie Ann, Willie Trapas, and Shirley. His brother, Frank, was also killed in the disaster.

Albert Wagers

Albert Wagers was 28 years old. He had worked in the mines for 12 years. He had spent 11 years at Finley's. His family includes his wife, Betty Lee and children, Anita, 5, Larry Beve, 4 and Richard, 1. He also leaves his mother, Amanda Henson Wagers; three brothers George, Willie Lee and Cecil; and three sisters, Sally, Geneva, and Sophia. His father, Beve Wagers, was also killed in a mining accident at Finley's on November 25, 1963.

Lee Mitchell

Lee Mitchell was 18 years old. He had worked about 6 months for Finley's. December 30 was the first day back on the job for Lee after being off for several months. He leaves his parents, Robert and Delphia Smith Mitchell, sisters; Bobbie Hoskins, 20, and Mary Ann, 16, and brothers, Billy Ray, 14, Bruce, 11, and Randy 8.

Walter Bentley

Walter Bently-Age 60, born October 10, 1910. Married to: Mrs. Bentley age 64, born May 13, 1906. Children: Ralph 38, Gracie 36, Glenna 34, Shelby Jean 30, Ben 28, Carolyn 26. He'd been working for Finley Company for about four months. He was a native of Leslie County. Mrs. Bentley wishes to thank friends and neighbors for assistance.

Lonnie Collins

Lonnie Collins age 28, was born on December 17, 1942. He was married to Jewel Dean, born 1938, age 32. Children: Larry, 12, step-son Sandy 3 1/2 daughter. Relatives killed in mining accident: Freddy and Kenople Collins. He was a native of Leslie County. His parents are Elsie and Bige Collins

Jim Jones

Jim Jones was 36 years old. His wife is Ruth Jones and his children are Velma, 12, Cordia Lou, 10 and Kathlene, 7. He had worked at Finley's for 3 years and was a Leslie County native.

Holt Couch

Holt Couch: born February 8, 1936, age 34. Married to: Mattie born May 2, 1931 age 39. Children: Judy Gil 16, Kelly Ray 11, Donna Kay 7. Relatives killed in mines: twin brother, Howard. Parents; Will and Elsie Couch.

Howard Couch

Howard Couch was born on February 8, 1936. He was married to Daisy Couch and had four children, Phyllis Jean, 10, Berna Dean, 7, Charlene, 5, and Eva Carol, 2. Howard's twin brother, Holt was also killed in the disaster. He also leaves his parents, Will and Elsie Couch. Mrs. Couch wishes to thank everyone for their assistance.

Alonzo Couch

Alonzo Couch: born September 26, 1934, age 36 Married to: Nettie, age 41 born November 27, 1929. Children: two sons ages 15 and 13 Parents: Coonie and Stella Couch. He worked in the mines for 17 years.

Rufus Jones

Rufus Jones-Age 53, born October 1, 1917; Leslie County. Married to: Betty Gibson Jones, 57, born February 14, 1913. Children: Rufus, Jr. and A. B.; both worked in mines for a time. Rufus now disabled; wife refuses to permit A. B. to return to mines. Relatives killed in accident: brother-in-law, Alfred Gibson

Alfred Gibson

Alfred Gison-was 45 years old. He was born July 8, 1926. He was married to Emily Sizemore Gibson age 59. His family includes eight brothers and four sisters living; mother Nance Ann living; father Archie, deceased; one step-daughter, Lena Ruth Bowling; one son Donnie Ray age 15. Relatives killed in mining accident; brother-in-law, Fufus Jones; several cousins. Born and reared in Leslie County; worked in mines several years.

Denver Young

Denver Young lived on Couch's Branch in Leslie County. He had worked in the mines approximately 6 years. No other information could be found about his family at this time.

Uncertain Winter Awaits Stunned 'Living Victims' Of Hyden Mine Disaster

By CRAIG AMMERMAN

HYDEN, Ky. (AP) — "Some people say we ought to quit going in them mines," said a woman in the automatic laundry. "But I ask you outsiders, just what would we do then?"

The woman's question is not one which answers itself in this southeastern Kentucky outpost of Appalachia near an underground coal mine which exploded Wednesday killing 38 men inside its twin 2,400-foot deep shafts.

Hyden, Ky., does not offer much obvious promise for things that don't involve the coal buried deep under the ground.

There are only 12 phone lines into this community of 600. There are two churches, two restaurants, a couple of grocery stores, a hardware store and several service stations, most of which also sell other goods.

And there are mountains, ones that make any kind of effective travel virtually impossible.

Between the mountains wind long, curvy valleys. Up most of them, lined along treacherous narrow dirt roads, are houses stuck here and there on available flat land. Usually up those hollows one can also find coal mines.

It is such a place where the Finley Coal Co. mine that exploded Wednesday is located.

The people of that particular valley—some 300 of them—took the blow of tragedy in a tradition that belongs to Appalachia and its people.

"It's a thing you come to fear, but you know it will happen ... You must hope it doesn't happen to you," one woman said from her home Thursday as she handed out coffee and homemade biscuits to newsmen who had trudged one and a half miles up the hollow and were exhausted, with still another half-mile to go before reaching the mine.

"There's not much else for a person to do up here except mine coal," she said. "The pay is enough to live on up here, and it's certainly better than taking the government welfare."

The men who worked and died in the Finley mine made $21 a day, about $12 a day below union wages. But not many of the mines in this area are union. A mention of the United Mine Workers brings blank stares.

Mine safety—laws like the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969—do not register either.

"All those inspectors want to do is make somebody happy and close down them mines," said Shelby Hacker, one of the miners working on rescue squads. "How the hell else are we supposed to feed our families, if it ain't cuttin' coal?"

The Finley mine had been cited several times for violation of safety standards, but remained open.

Hacker, 44, an 18-year mining veteran, said there wasn't any real reason to get an education because "it don't take education to cut coal ... and I don't know what else there is for a man to do, unless it's drive a coal truck."

One woman said her son had been through three heart operations and wasn't supposed to do heavy work.

"But he drives a coal truck," she said. "There's not much else he can do to feed us."

But that job, like 60 others that were held by miners at the Finley mine, are not now available for at least some time.

"It'll sure take a long time to get that mine back in working shape," one miner said. "Until then, I guess we try to get us some food stamps."

"It's a terrible thing," said the woman in Hyden's only laundry. "But I guess it happens and there ain't much we can do about it."

Policy options for welfare reform

An examination of the differences among poor relief programs and of the choices leading to stability or change in welfare policy

GILBERT Y. STEINER

MONTHLY LABOR REVIEW
March, 1971, Vol 94 No. 3

WELFARE IS A PUBLIC BUSINESS whose liquidation under honorable conditions has been a goal stated by political leaders from Franklin Roosevelt to Richard Nixon. "What I am seeking is the abolition of relief altogether," Roosevelt wrote in a November 1934 letter. "I cannot say so out loud yet but I hope to be able to substitute work for relief."[1] Thirty-five years later, explaining his family assistance proposal over nationwide television, President Nixon concluded that "What America needs now is not more welfare but more 'workfare.'"[2] In those intervening 35 years, however, neither work for relief nor work instead of relief nor work-related social insurance displaced the dole. Instead, by 1970, at least 14 million people unable to support themselves and willing to satisfy a means test to prove it benefited from one, or more than one, cash, food, or housing assistance program.

About 11 million additional persons with incomes below the so-called poverty line—roughly $3,700 for a four-person family—were not assisted. Many were employed but could not earn enough to bring their families out of poverty. Some benefited from private charity, some had been and might again be public charges but were temporarily independent, some were only technically in poverty (for example, low-income graduate students). Most of the 11 million, however, probably did without basic needs because of pride, because they did not know they could get help, because they could not meet one or another noneconomic eligibility condition, or because an appropriate program was not operative where they lived.

Cash payments to families with dependent children are budgeted for 1971 at $4.67 billion; veterans' nonservice-connected pensions, $2.27 billion; food stamps, $1.25 billion; public housing, $646 million.[3] The combined budgets for 1971 of just these four relief programs add to nearly $9 billion. That figure will shock some as huge, appall others as puny. In either event, it should invite attention not only to the relief programs, but to policymakers and the relief policymaking process as well.

Crude relief

Public subsidies to the poor have two principal styles or techniques, one crude, one subtle. The crude technique both limits benefits to those who can establish need through disclosure of their income and resources to an administrative official, and also explicitly pinpoints the beneficiaries. The subtle technique spreads benefits across a broad spectrum of the population, subsidizing many without need as well as those in need. Both crude and subtle techniques are compatible with payments either in cash or in kind.

In the subtle class, the leading program is compulsory, contributory social insurance (social security) to provide income for old age, for survivors, for hospital care of the aged, and for disability. Social security provides more cash assistance to poor people than does public assistance; social security also provides cash assistance to a good many people who are not poor, and would not be poor even without these benefits.[4] A different example of subtle relief is the Federal college housing loan program, which has the effect of reducing room rent by $6 to $7 a month for students at publicly supported colleges. While some very poor students are benefited by the program, at least 45 percent of the beneficiaries come from families with incomes above $10,000 a year.[5]

A REPORT FROM THE URBAN INSTITUTE

Volume 1, Number 2 March - April, 1971

MAR 23 1971

Anti-Inflation Strategy

Brake on price spiral by curbing duration, frequency of unemployment

Manpower training, now oriented primarily toward helping the unemployed and disadvantaged, should be vastly expanded and aimed at skill shortages as a major weapon against inflation.

Charles C. Holt, C. Duncan MacRae, Stuart O. Schweitzer and Ralph E. Smith set forth this proposal in their report, The Unemployment-Inflation Dilemma: A Manpower Solution.

"The structure of labor and product markets yields a relationship between the rate of inflation and the rate of unemployment such that aggregate demand policy alone is incapable of attaining full employment and price stability simultaneously," they conclude from their detailed research efforts.

Part of their research traces the postwar history in the United States of the trade-off between inflation and unemployment. The relationships they uncover explain why the low unemployment policies of the mid-1960's led almost inevitably to the high inflation problems of the past year, and why fiscal and monetary policies may reduce either unemployment or inflation, but not both at the same time, to satisfactory and stable conditions.

Their proposed manpower approach emerges from research findings about several aspects of unemployment, including the high rate of turnover in the labor market, the duration of time that people remain unemployed, and the fact that unemployment and job vacancies both can be "too high" as the result of market frictions.

Through theoretical and statistical analysis it appears that a high ratio of job vacancies to unemployment contributes to wage inflation and this is further aggravated when labor shortage bottlenecks occur in the high-skill categories. The wage inflation in turn contributes to and interacts with price inflation.

Some of the primary manpower approaches recommended by the authors are better understood in the context of the nation's existing manpower programs. These are geared almost entirely to helping people at the low end of the job ladder. The Institute researchers argue, first of all, that this aspect of manpower training should be enlarged, and that it would be unacceptable to help workers further up the ladder unless everything possible were done to help those with the greatest economic need.

But they note that programs oriented only to the lowest level have a tendency to displace or threaten the security of other workers, especially when jobs are scarce.

One thrust of the recommended solutions is to focus on training to relieve skill shortages. Pulling workers up a grade to fill these middle-level job positions of a technical or even subprofessional nature should unclog the labor market and permit upgrading all along the line.

Another thrust is to devise more effective ways of matching workers and jobs. If the matching is done more quickly, it would cut down unemployment by shortening the long durations of joblessness. If the matching is done with more attention to placing right people in the right jobs, this will cut down on unemployment by reducing the rate at which workers later will quit or be laid off.

By tracing complex labor market adjustments as they relate to inflation and unemployment, the researchers were persuaded that the manpower approach could help solve one of the crucial economic puzzles of the decade and provide a means for reducing both unemployment and inflation without setting in motion forces that will have a long-run worsening effect. □

Metropolitan States Proposed

Nation's urban areas would gain from revitalized federal system

As a political-financial solution to the plight of urban areas, Richard P. Burton of the Institute's urban public finance group proposed a constitutional change to permit the creation of Metropolitan States. He testified recently before the Joint Economic Committee about possible advantages of this proposal.

Urban officials widely believe that states have been slighting cities and favoring rural or suburban interests. This has led cities increasingly to try to forge their own direct links with federal funds and programs.

This growing breakdown of normal federal-state-local relations gives rise to the Metropolitan State arrangement as a means of restoring vitality to the three-tiered federal system. Essentially, the plan would give full state rights and powers to new Metropolitan States embracing the major concentrations of urban population, industries and clusters of communities, and leave the present 50 states with their domain over non-metropolitan areas.

Unlike many metropolitan consolidation schemes, Metropolitan States would preserve within them the existing communities and their presumed sensitivity to constituent preferences. Blacks and other minorities who have lately gained political power in central cities or surrounding urban jurisdictions would not be threatened as they are by centralization.

Burton holds that this would give urban areas a constitutionally and fiscally viable form of government. And by strengthening local government, it should check the tendency toward centralism. The author is mindful, of course, that achieving this fairly radical departure would be likely to involve enormous political obstacles. □

Strikers on Welfare

Workers on Public Aid During Walkouts Draw Increasing Criticism

Critics Say Such Help Leads To Lengthening Disputes; States Complain of Costs

'Strikers Are Taxpayers, Too'

7/14/71

By JAMES P. GANNON
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

PITTSBURGH—One man who is really worried about the threat of a steel walkout Aug. 1 is Edward H. Kalberer. "I just hate to think of it," he says. "It makes me pray for a miracle of no strike."

Mr. Kalberer isn't a steelworker, a steel executive or a mill customer. He is the man in charge of public-welfare programs in Allegheny County, which encompasses this steel-making center. And he is worried that his understaffed, tightly budgeted county welfare agency may be overwhelmed by strikers applying for food stamps, public assistance and other benefits if the United Steelworkers of America calls a steel-industry walkout next month.

To prepare for the possible deluge, the agency is considering setting up temporary welfare offices near the mills or setting up shop in the steelworkers' union halls. It estimates that at least 250 extra staffers would be needed to process aid claims from many of the approximately 59,000 steelworkers in the county. But, because of a budget bind, the agency has little hope of adding so much manpower. It has been sending representatives to USW local union meetings to explain eligibility rules and benefits of public-aid programs, hoping that the union officials may do some screening of members to ease the threatened paperwork jam.

The problems of the Allegheny County welfare agency are only one symptom of a major development that has important implications both for welfare programs and for labor bargaining generally.

Welfare: An Aid to Union Bargainers

Without attracting much attention until recently, American labor unions have developed an increasingly successful technique of using the nation's growing public-aid programs to reduce the economic pinch on striking members. Only now are big employers fully realizing, with alarm, that as a result they face a stronger foe at the bargaining table. Financially strapped state governments are finding more of a different type of welfare client at their public-aid offices: the factory hand who is generally stereotyped as antiwelfare but who may be changing his attitudes as welfare eases the woes of the walkout.

Welfare: An Aid to Union Bargainers

Without attracting much attention until recently, American labor unions have developed an increasingly successful technique of using the nation's growing public-aid programs to reduce the economic pinch on striking members. Only now are big employers fully realizing, with alarm, that as a result they face a stronger foe at the bargaining table. Financially strapped state governments are finding more of a different type of welfare client at their public-aid offices: the factory hand who is generally stereotyped as antiwelfare but who may be changing his attitudes as welfare eases the woes of the walkout.

A considerable controversy is brewing over this trend. Big employers hit hard by recent strikes, such as General Electric and General Motors, are stepping up public attacks on welfare for strikers. Congress and the courts have been considering its merits. The debate, both sides agree, is likely to persist a long time. "This may be the new industrial-relations issue of the 1970s," one GE management man believes.

Although the big controversy is new, the actual practice isn't. For years striking workers have resorted to public-aid programs during long walkouts. But both management and labor officials agree that the liberalization of welfare-eligibility rules, the development of new programs such as food stamps, and especially the unions' growing sophistication in taking advantage of such aid have made welfare for strikers much more significant in labor-management struggles.

A few samples illustrate this increasingly important role.

The GE and GM Strikes

In the 101-day national walkout by a coalition of unions against GE in 1969-1970, strikers collected an estimated $30 million of publicly financed aid, ranging from food stamps to welfare checks to unemployment compensation, according to one AFL-CIO official. In Massachusetts, more than 5,000 of the 20,000 GE strikers went on welfare, collecting more than $2.3 million.

James Compton, assistant to the president of the International Union of Electrical Workers, says there is "no question" that public aid "played a very major role" in the strike against GE. He credits the AFL-CIO's community-services department with a "tremendous effort" to tap all available public benefits. The public benefits, in fact, dwarfed the unions' strike funds; the $30 million in public aid was 10 times larger than the special fund the AFL-CIO collected for the union coalition.

In last year's 10-week walkout at GM by the United Auto Workers Union, strikers collected $12 million to $14 million of federally financed

Are Workers Antiwelfare? Not When They're on It

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

Workers' attitudes toward welfare may be changing as unions increasingly tap public aid in strikes, many observers believe.

"Once the worker crosses the threshold into the welfare office," his feelings tend to change, says Herbert R. Northrup, who is conducting a major study of the subject. "Once on welfare, you lose your aversion to it," he says. "This means that many people who previously felt that welfare was demeaning now feel that it is their right."

Others agree that the stereotyped antiwelfare views attributed to workers may be incorrect. Leo Perlis, an AFL-CIO official, says that years ago "one of the toughest jobs was to convince our people that it was not a shameful thing" to accept welfare when on strike. "Now there is less reluctance. There is no longer the shame," Mr. Perlis observes.

Welfare officials say that striking workers increasingly adopt the attitude that they are entitled to their "share" of public-aid programs because their taxes support the welfare system.

food stamps in October and November, the U.S. Agriculture Department estimates. In Michigan, according to state statistics, 75,000 of the 200,000 GM strikers there were certified eligible for food stamps; 25,600 received welfare under either the program for aid to dependent children or general-assistance plans. The dependent-children payments totaled $4.3 million in the last three months of 1970.

The Westinghouse Strike

In a five-month strike by the United Electrical Workers Union against Westinghouse Electric Corp.'s big plant at Lester, Pa., the welfare caseload in surrounding Delaware County ballooned. When the walkout by 5,700 workers started last August, the county had 367 persons in one category of dependent-children relief for families headed by males; that more than doubled, to 779 persons, by January, when the strike was in its last month. The relief rolls dropped back sharply after the strike ended Jan. 25.

These and similar cases are the subject of the first comprehensive research study of the subject, currently being conducted by Herbert R. Northrup, director of the industrial-research unit at the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Northrup, an authority on labor matters, believes that the use of public aid in strikes is "a major problem."

"We feel this is becoming a significant welfare cost and is having an impact on collective bargaining by making strikes longer and settlements higher," Mr. Northrup says. "From a public-policy point of view, we haven't really thought through the question of whether we can live with a system where strikes don't hurt one party seriously. I don't want anybody to starve, but I know collective bargaining can't work unless a strike hurts both sides."

Major employers are becoming more vocal in opposing aid to strikers, particularly since some of the biggest companies have been hit by long, costly walkouts.

Such aid "tends to encourage and prolong strikes," charges George B. Morris Jr., director of labor relations for GM. In a recent speech in New York, Mr. Morris said: "Permitting the trend toward public assistance to strikers to continue is one of the surest ways I know to destroy collective bargaining. Strikes serve the function in collective bargaining of bringing pressure to bear on management and the union to reach a settlement. In order to do this, strikes must pinch both sides."

Virgil B. Day, a GE vice president, charges that public aid in walkouts means "that the government is subsidizing strikes." He adds, "This doesn't help the anti-inflation game plan, and it can't be offset by (governmental) exhortations to negotiate lower settlements."

The Union Viewpoint

Labor leaders don't deny that welfare benefits make surviving a strike easier. But they contend that as taxpayers, union members on strike are as entitled to public aid as other needy people and that life isn't easy for strikers, just because food stamps or welfare checks are available.

Criticism of aid to strikers is "part and parcel of a general attack on the welfare system and on labor unions generally," contends Leo Perlis, director of the AFL-CIO's department of community services. Mr. Perlis has masterminded labor's efforts to tap public programs. Of late, he has been cranking up his defenses. Late last year, during the GM strike, he sent a letter to affiliated unions giving labor leaders suggested ammunition to "answer these attacks."

Some samples: "Taxpayers' dollars are used to feed hungry people in other countries. . . . Tax dollars feed criminals in prison. . . . Tax dollars provide food, clothing, shelter and medical care for enemy prisoners of war. Are fellow Americans engaged in industrial warfare entitled to less?"

Mr. Perlis argues that the only criterion for aid should be need, whether caused by "an act of God, an act of nature, an act of management or an act of labor." Strikers shouldn't receive public-aid benefits if they don't meet the eligibility requirements, he says, but if they qualify, they shouldn't be discriminated against because they are on strike.

Even with public help, "everybody suffers in strikes," asserts James J. Matles, secretary-treasurer of the United Electrical Workers. "It's ridiculous to say they are on easy street" if strikers are receiving food stamps or welfare checks, he says. The idled worker "just piles up a tremendous debt that he has to pay back when he returns to work," he adds.

Community Service Representatives

Partially to aid strikers, the AFL-CIO has developed a nationwide network of 180 full-time "community service representatives" in 140 areas. These union men are designated by the AFL-CIO but are on the payrolls of the local United Fund or Community Chest—organizations in which labor has considerable clout because of its large contributions. These 180 specialists perform a coordinating role in any strike by an AFL-CIO union, helping the local involved to inform strikers about public-aid programs. They also perform many other jobs that aren't related to strikes, such as helping recruit union members for United Fund drives.

The AFL-CIO has geared up its strike-assistance mechanism to swing into action in case there is a walkout today by the Communications Workers of America against American Telephone & Telegraph.

Individual unions also have their own strike-assistance setups. To prepare for the possible steel strike, for instance, the Steelworkers Union has been holding a series of conferences around the country for local union officers. These officers are told of public-aid programs, eligibility rules and application procedures.

Congress, Courts Study Issue

The debate over public aid to strikers is being echoed in Congress and the courts as legislators and jurists consider the issue.

States vary considerably in the availability of public-aid benefits in walkouts. Only two states, New York and Rhode Island, permit strikers to collect unemployment compensation, and both have a waiting period of seven weeks before a striker can start collecting.

Most states permit strikers to go on welfare if they meet the normal eligibility criteria. GE says it found in its long strike that of the 33 states in which it operates, only Texas, Virginia and Wisconsin "showed any disposition to bar strikers from collecting state welfare aid."

Under federal guidelines, food stamps, which permit needy families to greatly expand their grocery-buying power, can't be denied strikers who meet normal income guidelines. For instance, a striker's family of four with no more than $1,500 in savings and less than $30 in current monthly income could obtain free a monthly allotment of $108 of food stamps; if the family had $100 monthly income coming from say, a working wife, then the $108 in stamps would cost $25.

Congressional opponents of giving food stamps to strikers have made several close but unsuccessful attempts to ban the practice. Such an amendment was defeated in the House last December, and only last month an attempt to tack a no-stamps-for-strikers clause onto the Agriculture Department's appropriations bill for the current fiscal year was defeated, 225-172.

Key Court Case

In a key legal case, the Supreme Court recently declined to review a lower court's ruling permitting strikers to receive welfare benefits. International Telephone & Telegraph Corp. had challenged the right of Massachusetts to pay welfare benefits to ITT strikers. But the battle isn't over. ITT is asking the Supreme Court for a rehearing. Significantly, a number of states are joining ITT in asking the court to reconsider. Iowa has filed a friend-of-the-court brief supporting ITT and has been followed by at least 10 other states—Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, Florida, Maine, Mississippi, North Carolina, Utah, Virginia and Wyoming, according to Lorna L. Williams, special assistant attorney general of Iowa.

Michigan is among the states that can attest to the high welfare costs of a big, concentrated strike. Gerald Miller, a budget aide to the governor, says the UAW strike against GM cost the state about $25 million in added public-aid expenses, including unemployment compensation, besides costing another $100 million in lost revenues stemming from declines in collection of income, sales and corporate taxes. The $25 million covers benefits not only to strikers but also to those laid off because of the strike's impact on other employers.

WIN—or Lose?

'Work Incentive' Plan For Welfare Recipients Falls Short of Goals

Internal Rifts and Red Tape Thwart Training Program; New Skills, but Few Jobs

Yet the Waiting List Grows

7/26/71

By MARY BRALOVE
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

CLEVELAND — The agency's ambitious promise is "employment with a future"—and not just any job, but one that will meet a client's "full potential." Furthermore, it says, the job must pay sufficiently to propel the employe into "the mainstream of American life."

Into the mainstream and off the welfare rolls, that is. For this isn't any run-of-the-mill employment agency. It's WIN, acronymic for "work incentive" program. It was established in 1967 by an amendment to the Social Security Act to provide educational and job-training courses for welfare recipients. Its goal: to move these welfare recipients into a situation it calls "workfare."

The WIN center here in Cleveland is one of about 260 centers, primarily supported by federal funds, scattered throughout the country, and some observers say it's better than most others. Unfortunately for its supporters, however, Cleveland's WIN illustrates that the program has a long way to go before its goal is achieved.

"WIN is supposed to give you a hand so you can stand on your own two feet" says Cleveland resident Christine Swope, "but you end up just going down to the employment service and looking for a job."

Mrs. Swope, a welfare recipient, is in a position to know. About a year ago, a welfare caseworker referred her to Cleveland's WIN center. She jumped at the opportunity—having up to that time supported herself and her three-year-old son on a monthly welfare check, a small amount of money from her family and the income from a series of temporary jobs. She enrolled in and successfully completed WIN's eight-month bookkeeping-training course.

"Strangled by Bureaucracy"

Christine Swope's success was ephemeral. WIN was unable to land her a bookkeeping job. It turned out that prospective employers didn't consider the WIN bookkeeping course to be adequate training. Today, still without a marketable skill, Mrs. Swope continues to rely on welfare. "I'm the most disappointed in myself," she says. "I figure they wouldn't have sent me into the program unless I could get a job."

Mrs. Swope isn't the only disappointed person. Here in Cleveland, as in other parts of the country, WIN staffers are disappointed — and discouraged as well. In New York, a WIN staff member complains the program is "strangled by bureaucracy and the economy." In California, critics charge that WIN trains clients for jobs that don't exist.

Some WIN officials, however, say that too

In New York, a WIN staff member complains the program is "strangled by bureaucracy and the economy." In California, critics charge that WIN trains clients for jobs that don't exist.

Some WIN officials, however, say that too much is expected of the program too soon. "We're talking about changing life styles," says Jewell Howison, an official in Cleveland's WIN. "We don't break the cycle easily. It isn't changed overnight." Emden Schulze, employment service director of the Cleveland program, says, "There's an assumption that everyone's employable. You can lead a horse to water but you can't make him drink. You're working with unmotivated people. How do you motivate them?"

A Model for Nixon

The current situation is doubly discouraging to the program's supporters, since WIN began as a great hope of liberals and conservatives alike in the battle against skyrocketing welfare costs. It is, in fact, the model for the work-training portion of President Nixon's proposed Family Assistance Plan. (There are differences, however; under the Nixon proposal, all unemployed males, and unemployed female household-heads whose children are six years old or older, will be required to register for work-training. And the emphasis will be shifted to placing these persons in any available job, rather than "employment with a future.")

For the more than 113,000 persons currently enrolled in its training programs, WIN has been presented as a major chance for social and economic betterment. But such chances, at least for the moment, seem slim. Only 20% of WIN's clients have thus far obtained jobs. And the U.S. Senate in the last fiscal year cut back WIN funds by $70 million, or more than 50%, since initial forecasts of 280,000 trainees a year have thus far proven high; only 100,000 welfare recipients will participate in the program this year.

The causes of WIN's problems are varied. In a period of high unemployment, available jobs are few and often aren't in the fields for which WIN clients have been trained. Of equal importance, however, is the fact that WIN administrators are guided by vague aims and argue among themselves over the directions, priorities and emphasis of the program, sources say. Indeed, in some centers, squabbling between local welfare agencies and employment services—which jointly administer WIN—has become sufficiently serious to threaten the program's very existence.

Crumbling Under Pressure

Critics within the program, including WIN administrators, claim that WIN's lofty aims often crumble under the pressures of expediency. "You hear a lot about 'upward mobility,'" says a Southern WIN administrator, "but then you hear a lot about getting the people through training as quickly as possible to get them off welfare."

Other detractors claim that "employment with a future" frequently becomes any available job. "We're supposed to go after a client's highest potential," says one disheartened WIN staffer, "but if he can get a spot pumping gas for $1.60 an hour" that's what he ends up doing.

A major problem is the fact that "employment with a future" means different things to different people. In Cleveland, for example, WIN clients are being trained as nurse's aides. But in Long Beach, Calif., a legal-aide client is seeking admission to the WIN program. She feels she's stuck in a dead-end job—as a nurse's aide.

In the case of Christine Swope, Cleveland's WIN, unable to find her a bookkeeping job, referred her to a position as a social worker's aide. Mrs. Swope, however, declined, preferring instead to pursue her goal of becoming a bookkeeper through further training.

Mrs. Swope's case isn't much different from others in the annals of Cleveland's WIN center. Since its establishment in 1968, 25% of 2,094 enrollees have dropped out of the program. About 420, or 20% of the total, have been placed in jobs—but half this group no longer holds these jobs; many of these people are back on the welfare rolls.

Nevertheless, the Cleveland WIN's Mr. Schulze claims his center has been "reasonably successful." Mr. Schulze insists, moreover, that "if you judge the program in terms of statistics, no WIN program is going to stand out."

The Cleveland chapter of the National Welfare Rights Organization, a group of welfare recipients who lobby for welfare rights, has become sufficiently disenchanted with WIN that it advises its members not to enter the program. "What for?" asks Minnie Player, the Cleveland chapter's chairman. "To learn how to scrub and cook and clean?"

Avoiding Domestic Work

But Mr. Schulze says, "We try for jobs where there's a possibility of upgrading. We try to avoid jobs like salad-makers, domestics." Cleveland's program, like those of other urban WIN centers, trains women primarily in the secretarial-clerical and hospital-care fields. Men are mostly trained as machine operators and maintenance workers. In all cases, training lasts for no more than two years. But jobs, when they are obtained, generally pay close to minimum wage—by most standards barely enough to support a small family and not nearly enough to support a large one.

Last February, for example, those of Cleveland WIN's women graduates who landed jobs found themselves situated as nurse's aides at $1.60 an hour, laundry operators at $2.12 an hour, cashiers at $1.75 an hour and bank clerks at $2.11 an hour. Some of the program's male graduates filled jobs as stock clerks ($2.75 an hour), hand packagers ($2.50 an hour), assemblers ($2.50 an hour) and tile setters ($3.85 an hour).

That was February. By last April, according to projections compiled by the Ohio Bureau of Employment, even these jobs were no longer in demand. To be sure, the bureau predicted a continuing shortage of doctors, dentists, accountants with degrees and experienced secretaries. But for WIN graduates, the only openings seemed to be in the very areas from which many were trying to escape: nursemaids, cooks, salad girls, general maids and waitresses—often at salaries not much more than their welfare checks.

Dead-End Jobs

A typical refugee from dead-end jobs is Joyce (who declines to give her last name). Before entering Cleveland's WIN program, Joyce held down jobs as a split-shift telephone operator ("After four hours they'd tell you to go to a movie and then come back and work for another four"), a waitress and a barmaid. "At the bar, I was making enough money," she explains, "but it wasn't what I wanted to be."

And so Joyce entered WIN—in the meantime supporting herself and her six-year-old [illegible] welfare check plus a [illegible] rangements. WIN's employment-service teams subsequently guide clients through the programs' so-called components, including orientation and training, and eventually into the job market.

Caught in the Middle

It is the trainees, of course, who are caught in the middle of interagency squabbles. Frustrated by administrative delays and caught in a shrinking job market, they often find themselves being bounced from agency to agency within the program—with few concrete results. Jeanette Washington, Eastern regional director of the National Welfare Rights Organization, explains the feelings of some: "There are the neighbors that say, 'Hey, you've been in a training program—where's your job?' It's a hurting kind of thing that kills, that destroys. It's pride."

WIN, nevertheless, can claim some successes. Most of the trainees who complete its programs receive a high-school diploma or its equivalent; and in some rare instances, WIN has even pushed clients through college. Other trainees have gone on to become registered nurses, draftsmen and, at one project, undertakers.

Success, however, has its price. To place less than 500 people, Cleveland's WIN spent $2.8 million. In California, the placement of some 16,000 WIN graduates cost $56.6 million, and $28.5 million is slated for fiscal 1972.

Is it all worth it? Many observers have their doubts. However, one Louisiana WIN administrator, while admitting the program doesn't always achieve its objectives, claims that WIN achieves some positive results. "Even if (WIN mothers) return to domestic work," the administrator says, "they go back at a higher level."

Texaco Completes World's Deepest Producing Well

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

NEW YORK — Texaco Inc. completed the world's deepest producing well to date, flowing 20 million cubic feet of natural gas a day from 4.36 miles beneath the West Texas desert.

The well, E. Riggs Gas Unit No. 1, was perforated between 21,837 feet and 23,040 feet, becoming the first well to produce below 23,000 feet. It is a development well in the Gomez (Ellenburger) gas field of Pecos County, and is located six miles northwest of Fort Stockton.

It took the record from a well in the same field drilled by Gulf Oil Corp. last year. Gulf's No. 1-7 Fort Stockton Gas Unit, one-half mile northeast of Fort Stockton, produces from between 21,544 feet and 22,825 feet.

It took A. W. Thompson Drilling Co. 146 days to drill the record-setting Texaco well. The 15-mile long Gomez field has more than 70 producing wells below 20,000 feet. Industry sources estimate they cost about $1.5 million each.

Independent operator Ralph Lowe is drilling a wildcat test 11 miles southeast of Gomez that's scheduled to reach 27,000 feet. That would exceed the record of 25,600 feet for a dry hole recently set in South Louisiana by Placid Oil Co. A Lone Star Gas Co. subsidiary, however, plans to drill to 28,000 feet in western Oklahoma.

More than half of the world's specially built deep drilling rigs are operating in West Texas, all drilling for gas. These huge rigs can support and rotate a string of drill pipe weighing up to 750 tons. Geologists estimate that much of the nation's undiscovered natural gas lies between 20,000 and 30,000 feet in depth.

Dead-End Jobs

A typical refugee from dead-end jobs is Joyce (who declines to give her last name). Before entering Cleveland's WIN program, Joyce held down jobs as a split-shift telephone operator ("After four hours they'd tell you to go to a movie and then come back and work for another four"), a waitress and a barmaid. "At the bar, I was making enough money," she explains, "but it wasn't what I wanted to be."

And so Joyce entered WIN—in the meantime supporting herself and her six-year-old son on a monthly $158 welfare check plus a $60-a-month expense allowance from the program. Through WIN, Joyce hopes to land a job as a secretary. "This is the only way (welfare mothers) can get training," she says.

If Joyce is lucky and lands a job, she will receive certain "incentive" deductions allowing her to supplement her work income with welfare payments. While WIN men are entirely cut from welfare once they're employed, WIN mothers are entitled to deduct the first $30, plus the remaining one-third, of their monthly paychecks, as well as their transportation and day-care expenses; their welfare checks are then reduced by the remaining amount.

But even with incentives, WIN's critics claim that mothers are still forced to stretch their pocketbooks. Corroborating this criticism, Cleveland's local welfare office says very few WIN mothers obtain jobs that allow them to completely sever themselves from the welfare rolls.

Defending the program, however, Ed Robinson, Cleveland's assistant welfare director, says, "The thing is to get more money into the household. . . . It's not to get people completely off welfare."

Critics are even more vociferous about the fact that WIN can sometimes force welfare recipients to participate in its programs. For example, welfare agencies must refer all healthy unemployed fathers and out-of-school males over 16 years old to WIN; and in states where unemployed fathers and youths don't receive public assistance, mothers may be "mandatory referrals." Those who refuse without good cause are crossed off the welfare rolls.

A Coercive Whip?

The fact that WIN possesses this mighty weapon has caused some opponents to derisively dub the program "WIP," for whip. "WIP coerces mothers to leave their homes," asserts Jonathan Weiss, a project director at New York's Center on Social Welfare, Policy and Law. "Mothers themselves should make the decision whether they'd rather work or raise their own children. Middle-class mothers have that choice. Why not welfare mothers?"

In point of fact, however, WIN's defenders say that it seldom uses its cutoff power, since it has many more volunteers than it has places. In California, there are currently 190,000 people waiting to get into WIN projects. Here in Cleveland, there is a waiting list of 750 prospects, some of whom have been waiting since last December. "If you've got something – anything – where they can see they can get a job or training, they'll beat down your doors to get in," explains the Welfare Dept's. Mr. Robinson.

But the doors, in some cases, are rapidly revolving, since WIN's employment-service team can decide a client is ready for employment without any further training. A Cleveland WIN worker, for example, recalls the case of a client with two years of college education who was immediately referred to a job as a general laborer for a steel company. "He was up against it," said the worker. "He had to take the job or be threatened to be cut off welfare."

WIN's employment services have in some instances accused welfare agencies of sabotaging the program by various delays. For example, while welfare agencies reimburse WIN mothers for day-care expenses, such reimbursements have sometimes fallen as much as six to eight weeks behind – compelling some mothers to temporarily leave the program.

Such internecine warfare is particularly damaging, since WIN's administrative structure demands close interagency cooperation. Welfare handles the initial referrals to WIN, as well as the medical check-ups and day-care arof the National Welfare Rights Organization, explains the feelings of some: "There are the neighbors that say, 'Hey, you've been in a training program—where's your job?' It's a hurting kind of thing that kills, that destroys. It's pride."

BACKGROUND ON CHILD DEVELOPMENT

Conferees, Nixon at Odds On Day Care

By Nick Kotz
Washington Post Staff Writer

On Sept. 9, 1971, the Senate approved legislation that could dramatically change the lives of American children and their mothers. The bill would provide high-quality child day care at no cost for millions of poor children and at partial cost for millions more in the middle class.

If enacted into law, this proposal would fulfill a dream of women's liberationists. It would deeply involve the country in comprehensive early education for its preschool children. It would offer meaning to President Nixon's 1969 commitment "to provide all American children an opportunity for healthful and stimulating development in the first five years of life." It would provide significant practical advantages to about 10 million working women who could drop their young children off at day care centers.

And it would cost billions.

The proposed Child Development Act and a far more modest House-passed bill are now being considered in a House-Senate conference committee, attended by a dozen or so members of Congress.

The conference has made some progress as Sen. Walter Mondale (D-Minn.) and Rep. Albert Quie (R-Minn.) worked out a scaled-down compromise measure.

But the conferees have made no progress with President Nixon, who has threatened to veto any child day care plan that goes beyond the administration proposals.

Mondale views day care as a problem in itself. His concept of comprehensive education, health, and nutrition care is designed to accomplish more than provide baby-sitters for working mothers. His emphasis is on "child development."

In contrast, the White House has viewed day care primarily as a way to cut the welfare rolls. The idea is to provide care for children so welfare mothers can be required to work.

The President has endorsed the broader concepts of comprehensive day care, but administration officials insist that limited funds at present must be concentrated entirely on the welfare poor.

Mondale's bill, which passed the Senate, would provide:

- Free day care, with education, nutrition, and health components, to all children from families with less than $6,900 annual income for a family of four. (The $6,900 figure is what the Labor Department says an urban family of four needs to maintain a minimum adequate standard of living.) About six million children under age 6 would be eligible for free day care, and about 12 million more between ages 6 and 14 could receive free after-school care.
- Middle-class children would receive partially subsidized day care, while the wealthy would pay for it.
- The bill authorizes spending $2 billion a year, which would provide high-quality care to only about 2 million children. Far greater spending would be needed in future years to turn the new principle into a reality.

The first $500 million would be allocated to the poorest children in such existing programs as Head Start and $900 million would provide day care for children from families with less than $6,900 income. The other $600 million would provide day care for better-off families who would pay partial or full costs.

The Nixon administration prefers passage of no child development bill now, but would accept one that is geared entirely to its proposed revisions of the welfare laws. In the House-passed welfare bill, free day care is provided to working parents with less than $4,800 income. A welfare mother could get the day care only by taking a job. Families between $4,300 and $6,300 income could take tax deductions for amounts they spent on day care.

Mondale argues that day care is needed not only to free mothers to work, but to meet urgent needs of children, who are now receiving inadqeuate custodial care or no care at all.

"There are about six million pre-school children whose mothers work," says Mondale, "yet there are only 700,000 government-certified day care slots in the whole country. We don't know what happens to many of these children. But we know that hundreds of thousands are 'latch key' children, cared for by nobody. Many are in overcrowded, custodial care that is damaging children.

"In a country in which more and more mothers are working, we better start worrying about what is happening to their children."

Mondale, Quie, and other congressional proponents are strongly opposed to present quality day care programs which serve only the well-to-do and the very poor.

"Some people in the administration" said Quie, "want to run a program only for welfare mothers. You have to have an economic mix. It's just as bad to segregate people by economic level as it is by race, I know that Elliot Richardson (the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare) agrees with us on this."

The Nixon administration gave its philosophical support, if not its financial support, to comprehensive day care after a bruising intramural battle in which Secretary Richardson won out over the Office of Management and Budget.

However, the administration is insistent that aid be limited to families with less than $4,300 income and that priority go to welfare mothers who can be put to work.

"We're talking about a major financial commitment," said a ranking HEW official, "doubling spending on day care from $600 million to $1.2 billion. Some experts doubt that even that much money can be utilized effectively. But even if it could, there is just no more room in the budget.

"With limited dollars, we should concentrate that money on those who are employable, the poorest welfare recipients. If we had our way, it would be spent mostly on children over six, giving them part-time day care after school, until their mothers got off work."

The facts of the case are that there are now 32 million women in the work force and their numbers are growing rapidly. The number of working mothers has increased by 800 per cent in the last 30 years and now exceeds 12 million.

More than one-half of all mothers with children between ages 6 and 17 are working and about one-third of mothers with pre-school children are working.

Many of these women have a real problem. They either have to leave their children alone, with a relative, or pay for day care or a maid they cannot afford. The average woman in the work force earns $4,000 a year, and cannot afford quality day care which costs about $1,600 per child. Few working mothers can afford a maid or baby-sitter at $50 to $80 a week.

This predicament of the working woman has contributed to a formidable coalition backing the Senate bill. Their allies include the women's liberation movement, and civil rights and social action groups concerned about the disadvantaged child.

About 25 national civil rights, religious, education, and labor groups helped push through the Senate bill, and they are now fighting to save its basic principles.

Democrat Mondale and Republican Quie have reached a compromise that Quie and Rep. Ogden Reid (R-N.Y.) will present today to Secretary Richardson.

It provides free day care to children from families with less than $5,250 annual income. Families with higher income would get benefits up to a cutoff point of about $15,000 income. A family with $6,000 would pay $75 per child per year. A family with $7,000 would pay $175, one with $8,000 would pay $412, one with $10,000 would pay $712, one with $12,000 would pay $1,350.

"Quie and I are taking heat from both the left and the right on this compromise," said Mondale. "If the administration tries to shave it further, that will be the end of the negotiations. A bipartisan majority of Congress favors providing day care for more than just the rich and the poor. If that's what the administration is going to insist upon, I guess we are going to have our collision."

If the administration turns down the compromise, Quie predicts that the Democratic Senate and House conferees will merely approve the original Senate bill, which the administration already has said President Nixon will veto.

"I expect that they'll turn it down," said Quie. "I think they'll find it too expensive for them. And they have a legitimate concern about the costs, and about not falsely raising people's expectations."

Several HEW officials said privately that they thought Secretary Richardson has little bargaining room left with the White House, and will reject the compromise plan rather than waging another fight in the administration. These officials said HEW would continue to insist on a plan that provided child care only to families with less than $4,300 annual income.

A White House source familiar with the situation said: "We want to stick at $4,300, but Richardson is calling the shots right now. If he is persuaded there should be a compromise, he will discuss it further with the appropriate people at the White House and the Office of Management and Budget."

Federal School Lunch Plan Fails To Help 1.9 Million Poor Pupils

Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, Aug. 29—Today, nine months after President Nixon's target date of Thanksgiving, 1970, for extending the school lunch program to reach all needy children, 1.9-million children of the poor get none of its benefits.

But the Department of Agriculture—delegated the responsibility for carrying out the President's mandate—maintains that Mr. Nixon's original goal has technically been met.

Edward J. Hekman, administrator of the Food and Nutrition Service Division of the department, said in an interview that Mr. Nixon's goal was based on a figure of 6.6 million needy children—a figure used frequently by Dr. Jean Mayer, the President's nutrition expert.

Mr. Hekman said that his department had extended the lunch program to that number of needy children by January, 1971—only two months behind schedule. He said that the number now reached was 7.4 million.

A New Time Table

He said that statistics gathered later indicated that instead of 6.6 million, the estimate on which the president's goal was based, there were 9.3 million needy children.

"It would have been physically impossible to reach this new figure by Thanksgiving," he said.

Mr. Hekman said that the Department of Agriculture and the National Advisory Council created by the 1970 amendment of the School Lunch Act had discussed a new timetable.

"I expect the council to set a new target of about three years hence," he said. "The problem is bringing the approximately 20,000 schools not now a part of the program into the picture."

Mr. Hekman estimated that these schools — largely inner city or rural poverty areas—had one million eligible children.

These coupled with the 400,000 eligible but unreached children in schools that already participate in the program, would necessitate a total expenditure of about $570.4-million a year — well above the currently budgeted $389.4-million.

A Moot Question

This is based on Congress's estimate of $100-million for equipment alone and on Mr. Hekman's estimate of a Federal share of 42 cents a lunch for each of the 1.4 million additional children.

But, in view of hold-the-line posture of Mr. Nixon's budget men, it is a moot question whether this goal can be reached.

The amount spent last year for free or reduced-price lunches totaled $356.4-million. The amount budgeted this year exceeds that amount by about $33-million, according to Mr. Hekman.

Special provisions were made by Congress to provide $38-million in the fiscal year 1971 and $33-million in the fiscal year 1972 to put facilities in nonprogram schools.

The Administration cut this amount back to $16.1-million the first year and plans to use only $16-million this year.

"It may not be enough, but it will go a long way," Mr. Hekman said.

The sizable increase in the number of needy children—from 3.8 milion in 1969 to 9.3 million today—is related to state-initiated changes in eligibility guidelines, Mr. Hekman said.

The figure of 6.6 million children results from states using a $3,940 poverty level as a guideline, he said. Now, at least 22 states have raised their poverty-level standard to around $4,350.

Opponents of the department's methods of implementation and budgeting have accused the Administration in recent weeks of using calculated methods to halt the growth of the program.

The more notable critics include Senator George McGovern, Democrat of South Dakota, and a group of 35 directors of state child nutrition programs.

Guidelines Criticized

Each charged that while not cuttting back in program funds, the Administration had designed Federal reimbursement guidelines that held the state liable for a matching portion above that of last year's, in effect limiting expansion in states faced with financial problems.

Members of Senator McGovern's staff charged that funds in one special section had been released to states only after they had exhausted the two principal sections that provided funds under the lunch program act.

Senator McGovern plans a Congressional hearing on the program Sept. 7. He said that he would ask the Secretary of Agriculture, the director of the Office of Management and Budget and Mr. Hekman to testify.

The groups listed here are some of the more prominent ones on record for fighting hunger. Any school lunch campaign should include their local members.

Hunger Crusader Extraordinary:

"All that is needed for evil to succeed," wrote Edmund Burke, "is for good men to do nothing." Barbara Bode, hunger crusader extraordinary, is a good woman who does something. That something, for Barbara, is a relentless prodding, informing, and organizing citizens' groups throughout the country to get children fed through the National School Lunch Program.

As executive director of The Children's Foundation, based in Washington, she makes it her business to challenge federal and state feeding programs whenever they fail to get kids fed as the law intends. Before coming to The Children's Foundation, Barbara was field director for the National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition. Before that she was Community Developer for Prince George's County in Maryland.

In only a year and a half with The Children's Foundation, Barbara has become a recognized authority on child nutrition programs, valued consultant to action groups in every state, and scourge of bungling USDA bureaucrats. The School Lunch Bag, which she wrote and The Children's Foundation published last year, has become an indispensible handbook in community action campaigns to make school lunch programs work.

Barbara welcomes inquiries and solicits reports of lunch programs failing to reach all children or discriminating against the poor in any way. She knows the law and she knows how to get compliance. The Children's Foundation is at 1026 Seventeenth Street N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036. Its telephone number is (202) 296-4451.

On May 3, Barbara presented testimony before the U.S. Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Needs. She documented in such vivid detail the failures, false claims, and maladministration of the National School Lunch Program at federal, state and local levels that shock waves were felt far and wide.

She was one of the first to challenge the USDA's free lunch eligibility figures as grossly underestimated and its participation figures as grossly overestimated. Many months later, on August 29th, USDA finally admitted some of these errors.

Bode's testimony is summarized and excerpted below. The full account is available from the Senate Committee or The Children's Foundation.

Testimony to Senate: Statistical Deceipt

On May 3rd, Ms. Bode told the Senate Select Committee on Nutrition and Human Need that the USDA figures were "one of the shabbiest of numbers rackets." Citing USDA's claim in April that 6.8 million needy children were being fed free or reduced price school lunches, Bode said that free lunch participation rates in the District of Columbia alone were inflated by nearly one-sixth or 8,400 by the Department and, in South Carolina last November, by 17,314 more than the number actually reported to Washington by that state. Bode said that the D.C. government and the state of South Carolina "apparently had nothing to do with the deception because the same 'upward adjustment' or inflation was used to increase the paper participation figures for every single state."

"Official Lawlessness" Federal, State, Local

The leadership at the federal level, Bode said, is related to the abuses at the state and local level, intensifying "official lawlessness' in implementing and enforcing the new child nutrition legislation signed by the President nearly one year ago. This happens, she charged, despite the fact that the new legislation was designed to ensure every child from a needy family with at least one nutritious meal each school day. It clearly prohibited any form of harrassment or discrimination in the administration of the program.

In her testimony Bode detailed specific examples of officials breaking the law at all levels of federal, state and local government in administering the free and reduced price lunch program. In direct violation of the law, she claimed, some officials threaten that the "report cards of needy children will be withheld and that children will not be promoted until lunch bills are paid." Other children, again in violation of federal law, are forced to work for their lunches or are harrassed or discriminated against if their parents attempt to apply for that program. Some typical examples cited:

Cache, Oklahoma: One parent writes: "Monday morning all students must come forward with their lunch money. Indian children are called on and if they don't pay, they are dunned in front of classmates . . ."

Dallas, Texas: "A family of ten with an income of well below the eligibility scale is presently faced with a bill of $70 from Stoney Point Grade School. Applications for free lunch were never even sent home by the school."

Corpus Christi, Texas: "A family of five moved from San Antonio . . . They were told that the children could not enroll in school unless the school lunch debt from the previous school was paid first.The school gave in after a law suit was threatened.

Kansas: "In Johnson, a Chicano family of seven with an income of $80 a week was sent a bill for $66.85 recently. In Ulysses, a family of eight with an income of $1,740 last year was sent a bill for $29 in February."

"Funds, not free lunches for hungry children, not detailed plans for implementing the concern," Bode told the Senators seem to be the principal concern of administrators. In their plans of operation, few states even bothered to describe, as the new law requires "as a prerequisite to receipt of federal funds or commodites for the following year," how they planned "to furnish a free and reduced price lunch to every needy child" or "to extend the school lunch program under this act to every school in the state." (P.L. 91-248).

Yet the weak USDA regulations, Bode pointed out, do not even "demand a time table for extending the school lunch programs. No assurance is given that the states will be required to follow their plans. All they have to do is write them." In spite of the humane intent of the Congress, she noted, the USDA telegraphed its regional offices in October to reassure states of "no requirements to force any school into school lunch program, or to force feed children no matter how needy."

Such complacency at the federal level, Bode suggested, only reenforces state and local indifference, as she illustrated with these examples, among others:

Portland, Maine: "One school would be able to nearly double the number of lunches served per day with the addition of a steam table. However, since equipment funds are available only to districts without any school lunch programs . . . the school was unable to purchase the equipment needed to feed more kids."

Indianopolis: Authorities "proudly displayed a $500,000 central kitchen while pleading with the Church Federation to raise $42,000 for heating/cooling units in eight inner-city schools."

Bowler, Wisconsin: "Parents were told not to complain about the school lunch program, because free lunches would not be available anywhere in Wisconsin next year."

Chicago: "In February, the school food director said the school board was serving about 167,000 free meals daily. This figure exceeds the ESEA Title I number for low-income children in the public schools. The director said that consequently federal officials are threatening to charge Chicago with over-claiming."

Pittsburgh: "The school board is subsidizing reduced price lunches for students in six schools in high-income areas while there still are low-income schools without any lunch program. Officials claim they need this partial payment to keep the program in operation."

The USDA practice of overblown participation figures, Bode pointed out, together with its claims of adequate lunch program subsidies, is cruelly contradicted by the well-nigh universal report of financial straits by state and local food directors. Therefore "local officials have worked to discourage needy children from eating—not necessarily from malice but for financial reasons." Two examples cited:

Montgomery County, Md.: "In one of the nation's wealthiest counties, officials refuse even to try to bring any more of the eligible indigent children into the program. School lunch, they say, already is costing the county too much. Recently, they received departmental blessing to use school children as 'scab labor,' bringing down the food preparation costs and depressing the wages of cafeteria workers."

Earle, Arkansas: "Children who receive free or reduced price lunches are bused to other schools for lunch. They are being forced to make the choice between good meals and good education."

Yet discriminatory local administration reaps its cruel harvest too. Some typical reports:

Mobile, Alabama: (Community worker) "Free lunch children in many cases are singled out. Many families are having trouble in obtaining free lunches, and more than a few school principals seem reluctant to institute the free lunch program."

Barbara Bode

Chicago: (Church worker) "Teachers' lunches are available not only to teachers but also to any child who wants to pay the 65¢, 85¢, or $1.00 for the food which is different from the 'Type A' lunch — or a better quality, in larger quantities and fixed fancier."

Springfield, Mass.: (Lawyer) "One principal disciplines his students by excluding them from school lunch. Not to discriminate against those who receive free school lunch he also implements this practice against them."

Canton-Seiling-Longdale, Oklahoma: "Indian students complain that they are given one tablespoon of whatever food is served. When chicken is on the menu, the Indian students get the boney parts, such as neck, back, and wings. Indian students cannot go back for a second helping . . . Indian students are often pushed to the back of the line by the teachers and white students . . . One girl works in the lunch room (cleaning) for lunches for herself and a brother."

Lunch Applications: "Short, Clear, Simple"?

Bode told the senators how many school officials discourage parents from applying for free or reduced price lunches by sending home complex, intimidating application forms. Many ask questions in clear violation of the law, which calls only for "short, clear and simple" self-certification. Even the official prototypes from Northeast and Southeast regional offices, Bode charged, are "neither short nor clear" and simple only in presuming that "low-income parents are simple minded and need to be addressed as children."

For example, in Minatare, Nebraska: and Mobile, Alabama; she said, "all low-income parents are required to justify their applications on the basis of 'special needs.'" Richmond, California, demands that a parent sign away his rights to the protection of the challenge procedure.

Iowa: Ignoring the self-certification provision, the State School lunch director was quoted as saying, three months after school began, "that many of the kids who had applied for free and reduced price lunches were still waiting to be approved and certified while school officials were checking their eligibility."

In Keokuk, Iowa, Bode related, needy elementary children had to identify themselves publicly and board a special bus to the only lunch program in the junior and senior high schools. Many families declined that kind of labeling for their children. When a CAP worker complained, her supervisor was warned by school officials either to "call off his dogs" or risk losing CAP funds which "came through the school district." When officials of the Keokuk council of churches sought USDA clarification of policy for Iowa, their inquiry was "mislaid" for weeks by USDA. By the end of last year, less than 30% of those eligible in Iowa were receiving a free or reduced price lunch, Bode noted.

Photos: Paul Conklin

Michigan: A citizens committee in Grand Rapids, Michigan, Bode reported, "tried unsuccessfully for 22 months to get information about the school lunch program from local and state officials," even with aid from a senator and from national organizations. When they "found others in neighboring towns with similar programs, they decided to call a statewide meeting." Local school lunch directors, gathered from across the state, refused them an audience. When the citizens' group then planned a peaceful march to protest the refusal, its leaders received long-distance phone calls from the state capitol and from USDA in Washington, both with pleas to cancel their plans. At last they were acknowledged!

Bode urged the senators to help insure "honest and responsive public officials" who can help us "approach the President's goal of ending hunger in America for all time." By contrast, she claimed, "the Department of Agriculture still is dealing cavalierly with lives of children and with all of us." She ended her testimony with "three urgent requests."

"1. That all Instructions, Notices and Memoranda relating to child nutrition programs be published in the Federal Register (as HUD has just begun to do);

"2. That a percentage of the funds appropriated for child nutrition programs be used to fund poor people's groups and community-based coalitions for substantive outreach efforts to truly extend child nutrition programs to all needy children as promised in P.L. 91-248;

"3. That the "standstill" budget for child nutrition programs not be allowed to stand but rather, that it be expanded to fulfill the promise of at least one good meal a day to the 10 million needy children still going hungry in the United States today and to their classmates in the 23,000 schools still without lunch programs."

USDA Response: Harrass the Hunger Fighters

Barbara Bode's testimony before the Senate Select Committee set off quite a few sparks. The June, 1971, issue of the newsletter of The Public Information Center chronicled some of the responses. First of all, USDA responded to her accusation of playing the "cheapest and shabbiest of numbers rackets" by raising its estimates of needy children receiving free and reduced price lunches to 7.1 million.

Richard Lyng, assistant secretary of Agriculture, subsequently admitted that this figure was arrived at by inflating daily participation rates by as much as 16 per cent to allow for what he called an "absentee factor."

Two days after Miss Bode's testimony. Lyng, on a nationally-broadcast radio program titled "All Things Considered," was given full opportunity to dub in responses to Miss Bode's charges without a corresponding opportunity for rebuttal on her part. (This bizarre technique compounded by the radio announcer's statement that Lyng was appearing "with" Miss Bode, led The Children's Foundation to complain to the Federal Communications Commission that the producer of the program, the federally-subsidized National Public Radio, had violated the fairness doctrine.)

Lyng went on to accuse Miss Bode of withholding damaging information from USDA so that she could "make a splash" before a Congressiona committee. He speculated that she was attacking the Nixon Administration "for what must be political reasons" rather than trying to improve administration of the school lunch program.

But nearly all the abuses outlined in Miss Bode's May 3 testimony occurred after her appearance February 15 before the Citizens Board of Inquiry into Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States, and all but the most recently cases were filed as documented complaints with USDA. The agency took four months to answer one complaint letter, and USDA has yet to answer the complaints submitted on February 15.

In fact, a major issue in the anti-hunger fight is the manner in which the Agriculture Department disposes of such complaints. Allegations of gross violations of the law are handled by the Inspector General's office. But what Lyng calls "an administrative type of complaint, (where) there is not much likelihood of a criminal charge or of a gross violation of law," is bounced back to a USDA Regional Office, where it is handled "administratively."

In practical terms, this means that USDA officials check out complaints with the same local officials who have been accused of causing the problem. That way, no one of any importance is offended, and communities are not troubled with the presence of federal investigators who might uncover embarrassing violations of the law.

"To file a complaint with the Department of Agriculture means to be shuttled from one department to another, to another and finally, a complaint written by a private citizen ends up with a kind of self-investigation by a local school itself," says Miss Bode.

State and local officials are, if anything, even less responsive than Washington bureaucrats. When Paul Matthias, director of the South Carolina Council on Human Relations, documented the scandalously low level of participation in free and reduced price lunch programs last April, a state education official replied, "Mr. Matthias comes out with a statement like this every six months or so. Participation in the program is never going to be perfect."

These incidents of callous injustices toward poor people are inseparable from USDA's larger policy of keeping down the school lunch budget. State school lunch plans reviewed by Miss Bode and Jean Fairfax of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund showed "without exception, an obsession with money—though not necessarily for free and reduced price lunches." Some strongly urged reduction in the rising prices of "full cost" lunches because the programs are losing paying students. Specifics change from state to state, but the need for increased budgets and planning remain constant. In California, Wilson Riles, the state superintendent of education, claims that his state ran up a deficit in its school lunch budget precisely because it took the school lunch laws too seriously.

"It is ironic to note the vast difference between the state directors' estimates of financial need—if they were to fully follow the law—and the Department's official position," says Miss Bode. "Rather than concentrate on implementing the will of Congress, the Department of Agriculture has chosen to blur the issue with inflated participation rates, maladministered regulations, delayed instructions and a destructive commitment to an inadequate budget."

The Welfare Reform Impasse

Who Speaks for 7 Million Children?

By Nick Kotz

"Perhaps we cannot prevent this from being a world in which children are tortured," wrote French philosopher Albert Camus, "but we can reduce the number of tortured children. If we do not do this, who will do this?"Who in Washington represents the vital interest of 7-1/2 million poor American children whose daily bread depends on welfare payments under the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program?

As 535 members of Congress, a President, a vast executive branch, and hundreds of special interest lobbyists compete for power here, it is hard to find anyone whose primary concern is to reduce the numbers of tortured, dependent children.

The debate over welfare reform has centered on a variety of issues: the cost of welfare to taxpayers, the effects of a guaranteed annual income on the work ethic, the consequences to society of deserting fathers and mothers who bear children out of wedlock and rear them at public expense.

These are legitimate issues of public concern. It is a matter of dispute as to who is most to blame for the helpless economic dependency of these children. One can blame parents, pernicious racial discrimination, and malfunctioning economic, social and educational systems, as well as government at all levels. But the fact remains that 7-1/2 million children now subsist on welfare payments far below the amount needed for adequate diet, shelter and clothing. And surely the children are not to blame.

How have the movers and shakers dealt with the interests and desperate needs of these children?

* The Nixon administration: President Nixon's welfare proposal boldly breaks new ground by advocating uniform federally administered welfare with a federally-paid floor of $2,400 a year for a family of four, and payments for the "working poor."

Yet the Nixon administration bill, which has now passed the House, would permit states actually to cut present benefits to 80 per cent of the children now on welfare. And the bill would permit states to wipe out $2-1/2 billion in food stamp benefits, which now make the difference whether millions of children eat or don't eat.

Although he previously called welfare reform his "number one domestic priority," the President picked out welfare and revenue sharing as the programs he would defer as part of his package of economic measures.

* The House of Representatives: The bill was developed entirely in closed sessions of the House Ways and Means Committee. The motto of chairman Wilbur Mills is "to make it hard to get on welfare and easy to get off."

Until a few weeks before House floor action, not a single representative, aside from the Black Caucus, pushed a rival bill, that would have offered more generous benefits, or at least protected the present ones.

The Committee for Adequate Welfare Reform Now had trouble finding a "Northern liberal" willing to introduce its plan for paying the welfare poor at least the government-defined minimum poverty level income, now $3,960.

In the final days before the House vote, the Black Caucus of 12 congressmen with a few white allies sought vainly to open up the bill for improvement. The Caucus favored the National Welfare Rights Organization plan of $6,500, but would have been grateful merely to pass a bill in which no welfare recipient lost present benefits or legal rights.

*The Senate: In the initial Senate Finance Committee hearings, only Senator Abraham Ribicoff (D-Conn.) questioned administration officials about the loss of rights and benefits by welfare recipients. The other liberals on the committee—Senators Fred Harris (D-Okla), Vance Hartke (D-Ind.), and Gaylord Nelson (D-Wis.) usually were absent or silent. Nelson's initial questioning ignored the needs of children, and concentrated entirely on the job rights of state welfare department employees.

Only Ribicoff has introduced a rival bill, and only one Senator, Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.), has joined him as a co-sponsor. The Ribicoff bill would guarantee that no recipient lost present benefits or rights, provide for an initial minimum payment of $2,800, and increase this payment over four years to provide a newly-defined minimum adequate income.

*The business-lobbyists: The U.S. Chamber of Commerce, not unexpectedly, vigorously opposes income supplements to the working poor on grounds these payments would undermine the work force available for poverty-salary jobs.

*The Leadership Conference on Civil Rights: This coalition of organized labor, religious, civic, and civil rights groups has in the past lobbied effectively to pass civil rights laws and to defeat the Supreme Court nominations of Clement Haynsworth and G. Harrold Carswell.

On the welfare issue, the Leadership conference has been splintered and impotent. The AFL-CIO first blocked the coalition from fighting for a more generous bill on the House floor. Then, labor lobbied actively for the administration bill. Now labor has broken away from the coalition's new position and lowered its sights on what the poor children should receive in public aid.

Philanthropic and civil rights groups in the coalition also have failed to distinguish themselves as battlers for little children.

Clarence Mitchell, the legislative representative for the NAACP, bowed to labor's wishes in the House welfare fight and indicates he will work closely with labor in the Senate.

John Gardner and his Common Cause, and the Urban Coalition took official "paper positions" for higher benefits, but did not lobby vigorously for them in the House. The League of Women Voters also favored more generous welfare but then refused to fight in the House and is now reevaluating its position. In fact, all three groups supported the administration bill in the final House vote.

Organized labor, Clarence Mitchell, Common Cause, the Urban Coalition, and the League of Women Voters all cite reasons of "strategy and tactics" for their actions and inactions.

These groups and newspapers including The Washington Post argued that the House was not receptive to a more generous bill, and the Senate should be the battleground. Such practical political judgments must be made and can be defended. But the new Senate battleground is one in which the modest Ribicoff alternative has exactly one other sponsor.

The much-touted "lib-lab" lobby also has a whole series of conflicts of personalities and special interests that keep it from pushing adequate welfare for children. No one wants to offend organized labor, which provides the political muscle for all liberal legislative fights.

The Urban Coalition and John Gardner at Common Cause are said to worry about offending the business portions of their constituencies and are not enthusiastic about welfare. And organized labor has other fish to fry, as it deals with Wilbur Mills about minimum wage and health insurance, issues of prime importance to the unions.

The only strong, consistent voices for the children have come from Welfare Rights and from the National Council of Churches and other church groups. Their ideas generally are dismissed as impractical. The personal style of George Wiley and his angry welfare mothers offends Washington, including the Leadership Conference professionals who consider themselves sophisticates in the Washington power process.

The militant style once was considered courageous when blood was spilled and martyrs were made in the South to win theoretical civil rights. But now the question is how much those rights are worth when 7-1/2 million children may be denied the bare necessities to start out in life.

The liberal congressmen and lobbyists say they are facing the practical realities of Washington. The next reality is getting a bill past a hostile, largely reactionary Senate Finance Committee. So maybe this committee isn't a good place to fight for children. Wait 'til the bill gets to the House floor, is their stated new practical remedy. Beyond the Senate lies a House-Senate conference and more realities. Wilbur Mills usually dominates these conferences, and he will be surrounded almost entirely by allies whose preoccupation is with "welfare chislers."

Unfortunately, the practical political realities of Washington, as they are now understood here, do not come to grips with the moral imperatives that are part of the most basic founding principles of this nation.

Adequate Income

What the School Lunch Campaign is really all about is Inadequate Income. As insane, as barbaric, as unbelievable as it may seem, this wealthiest of nations tolerates poverty, unemployment, and hunger among a sizable portion of its people. If left unchecked, these could become epidemic; even now, none of us is left untouched by their effects. Rising taxes, crime, drugs, deteriorating cities, bankruptcy, breakdown of vital services, all touch and taint our lives.

It is not enough any more to demand welfare reform because we think the poor deserve better. It has become an absolute imperative—for all of us. By fighting for adequate income for the poor, we save ourselves—no matter how 'comfortable.' Because no one can really be too comfortable these days—as long as the epidemic runs rampant.

We are reprinting on this page an article by Nick Kotz, staff writer for the Washington Post; it appeared in that paper on August 26. He begins it with a quotation from Albert Camus that should have special meaning for all of us—it explains why we have a School Lunch Campaign as well as a campaign for adequate welfare reform.

If, after you study both the article and the facing chart, you would like additional information or to enlist in the campaign, please write to either or both of the following: National Welfare Rights Organization, 1419 H Street NW, Washington, D.C. 2005 and Campaign for Adequate Welfare Reform Now, 110 Maryland Avenue, NE, Washington, D.C. 20002.

As the various welfare reform bills are due for consideration soon by the Senate Finance Committee, you might want to register your opinion with its members—particularly if your Senator serves on it. Its members are:

Can Welfare Be Reformed?

OVER THE PAST THIRTY-FIVE YEARS one prescription after another has been tried in order to reach a goal stated by both Democratic and Republican Presidents —the honorable liquidation of public welfare programs in favor of productive work. But by 1970 the number of people who were unable to support themselves and willing to prove it, and who were benefiting from one or more cash, food, or housing assistance programs, had grown to 14 million. Perhaps another 11 million with incomes below the poverty line were, for one or another reason, not participating. But more than sympathy, advice, or surplus food, relief clients need cash and a commitment to make dependency an honorable condition. These are among Gilbert Y. Steiner's conclusions in The State of Welfare, a new study of the politics of public relief.

Public subsidies to the poor have two principal styles or techniques, one subtle, the other crude. The subtle techniques spread benefits across a wide spectrum of the population, without regard to need. Social security is an example. Crude programs pinpoint beneficiaries and limit benefits to those who can establish need through a means test. The four crude programs considered in Steiner's study are aid to families with dependent children (AFDC), veterans' nonservice-connected cash pensions, food stamps, and public housing. The combined budgets for these four programs in 1971 total nearly $9 billion. None, however, is available solely on the basis of need; applicants must all meet some other set of criteria.

The State of Welfare, by Gilbert Y. Steiner. Published March 1971, 346 pages, $7.50 cloth, $3.50 paperbound.

This competitive relief apparatus grew out of decisions made at various times for very different reasons rather than from any concern to establish a concerted national welfare policy. Accidents of history and failure systematically to reconsider programs have resulted in a hodgepodge of inconsistencies and inequities in public relief. For example, since veterans' pensions and AFDC benefits must be furnished promptly to all eligible applicants, why should eligible applicants for food stamps and public housing have to wait for benefits until a stamp program is established in their area or until a housing vacancy occurs?

The failure of past policies is nowhere better illustrated than in the decade of tinkering that went on after 1960 in what many consider to be the heart of the "welfare problem"—the program of aid to dependent children. The public welfare amendments of

Welfare Rolls Up---Errors, Too

A flood of new welfare applicants in Georgia has resulted in many incorrect payments, but the state's errors are still lower than the national average, according to the State Department of Family and Children Services.

"These incorrect payments reflect the fact that the welfare system has been almost overwhelmed by the tremendous changes that have occurred within it over the past four years," said a statement from Welfare Director Jim Parham's office.

The national average for ineligibles in the programs for the aged, blind and disabled was 4.9 per cent, while the figure for Georgia was 3.9 per cent, the department said.

There was a national average of 5.6 per cent — compared with 4.2 per cent in Georgia—for ineligibles for aid to families with dependent children (AFDC).

The welfare statement further said, "In Georgia the AFDC rolls tripled from January 1967 to January 1971. Handling this flood of new applicants and acting on them within the required 30-day time limit has severely strained the system."

It was reported that during the 1970 calendar year Georgia's welfare eligibility workers handled 125,916 new applications, did 269,801 recertifications and handled 240,537 food-benefit certifications.

"Caseloads have been so heavy," the welfare department said, "that work must often be done hurriedly to meet time requirements. The department's request for funds to hire additional eligibility workers to lower caseloads was turned down last year. . . .

"In such a large, complicated system errors are bound to occur. Inexperienced workers make errors in applying the regulations. Clients, many of whom are illiterate or poorly educated, give the wrong information, usually by mistake and occasionally by design."

WEEKEND WRAPUP

1972 IS THE YEAR which will decide if Richard Nixon is a one-term President. During 1971, Mr. Nixon took some Democratic tools and turned them to his own political advantage, and to the nation's. But whether he has his heart in it all, we'll see this year. Will his economic controls (trickle-down with some neat cosmetics to fool the public) and search for peace (a weekly summit) work or won't they? Only time can tell. The unfairness of the wage freeze has been slightly mitigated by Congress, but the holdup on the aerospace contracts is another indication that Big Business is in the saddle and working people have to take it on the chin. The inflationary pressures are not coming from the sectors of the economy where organized labor is strong, but the myth persists that workers are affluent and greedy. Even housing costs are not to be blamed on construction labor—since most of the inflationary bulge comes from soaring land costs, rising interest rates, and little of the housing construction today is covered by building trades contracts.

ESCALATION OF THE WAR in Indo-China is a bad sign for any hope that U.S. troops will get out—completely. The romantic notion that a residual group of 50,000 U.S. troops should stay indefinitely is certainly a way to condemn our prisoners of war to the agony of indefinite imprisonment—and many of the POW families are painfully wising up to what is being done to their loved ones. The destruction which U.S. bombs do on Indo-China is sowing bitterness which generations will take to undo.

THE PAST YEAR will be remembered by working mothers as the year they got a slap in the face from the President, whose veto of the child care bill meant that more women work long hours at low pay and continue to pay for child care out of their pitiful earnings, while men can deduct everything imaginable as a business expense. The press did little to publicize the child care fight, a presidential veto does not get as much space as a Florida summit meeting—but the word is slowly moving out to the hinterland, and it's bound to be an issue in this year's election.

ONE WORTHWHILE THING the Nixon administration did was to push for welfare reform. There are big differences in the various proposals pending. The Nixon plan would actually reduce income for many needy people trapped in big northern cities, but it would help the southern poor. However, the Nixon people have taken to giving the issue some visibility—witness the "Welfare Myths vs. Facts" booklet which is the basis for the New York Times chart on page 2 of this week's issue. But the Republican and Democratic conservatives are still balking at even the crumbs offered by the Nixon plan—thus the political impasse in Congress, which with some luck we may break during 1972.

JOHN EDELMAN proudly walked the halls of Congress as "a labor lobbyist" and he did as much as anybody to establish the broad spectrum of interests which has generally characterized the labor lobby in Washington. As Harry Conn of Press Associates recalls, even his legislative opponents listened with a certain awe at John Edelman's elegant brand of social concern. He called as few weeks ago to check out some facts for his autobiography, and we hope he managed to finish it before his death last week.

Setback given bosses in bid for union vote

DETROIT—Anti-union employers emboldened by the pro-business attitude of the Nixon Administration have received a setback because of the action taken by the National Labor Relations Board against the Timken Co. plants in Bucyrus, O., UAW Vice President Pat Greathouse said last week.

The board set aside a representation election at the Bucyrus plants, which the UAW lost by 44 votes out of 1,021 cast, on the ground that the company had threatened the workers with layoffs if they voted for the union.

Greathouse, the UAW's organizing director, in commenting on the board's unanimous decision, said: "The NLRB, under the leadership of its Nixon-appointed chairman, Edward B. Miller, has allowed companies wide lattitude in making threats against workers during union organizing campaigns.

"But these threats by Timken were so blatant and so raw that even Chairman Miller could not tolerate them. We are pleased to note that the NLRB's recent bias against organized workers still stops short of complete unfairness."

A date for the second election ordered by the board has not yet been set.

During the organizing drive among the Timken-Bucyrus workers last summer, a Timken official told a "captive audience" of workers that the work force at Timken's unionized plants had been reduced by 1,576 through layoffs and attrition, but that the level of employment at the non-union Bucyrus plants had remained unchanged.

"This did not happen accidentally," the company official told the workers. "It was the result of specific plans . . . to provide job security for you."

The UAW charged Timken with "the implication that layoffs would have resulted in the Bucyrus plants had the employees been organized . . ."

The NLRB agreed with this assessment, and with the finding of its regional director that the company "interfered with the employees' freedom of choice in the election . . . by implanting the fear of loss of employment" if they voted for the union.

The UAW was notified recently of the board's action ordering a new election, Greathouse said.

Subsidies run to $308 per U.S. citizen

A congressional report said last week that direct and indirect government subsidies cost the American taxpayer "at least" $63 billion a year—and no one knows what he gets for the money.

The total figure, added up in a study by the staff of the House-Senate Economic Committee, amounts to more than $308 for every man, woman and child in America and is about one-fourth of all the federal government spends each year.

But the committee defines "subsidy" broadly to include not only direct federal payments to people—such as payments to farmers to retire fertile acres—but indirect payments such as tax deductions to people who own their own homes and whose real estate taxes are deductible.

"The system of federal subsidies seems to be somewhat out of control in the sense that it continues to grow despite the fact that we know so little about it," the study said.

Unlike direct federal appropriations, which get scrutinized by the administration which seeks them and the Congress which approves them, the study noted, subsidies, once enacted tend to linger forever—even when the purpose for which they were created no longer exists.

"This mammoth subsidy represents a mindless means of spending taxpayers' money," said Sen. William Proxmire, D-Wis., chairman of the committee.

"There is virtually no analysis of economic benefits and little analysis of the cost of these programs. Neither Congress nor the Executive Branch determine if alternative programs can do a better job. There is no effort to see if the marketplace would be a more efficient way to achieve the goals. There is no evidence collected to analyze each subsidy program in relation to the costs and benefits of other pressing needs."

The study said outright cash subsidies amount to $10 billion to $13 billion a year, tax subsidies amount to $38 billion, federally subsidized loans to $4 to $5 billion and "benefit-in-kind" subsidies—such as the subsidized postal system or public housing—amount to $10 billion.

Sometimes, the study said, subsidies work at cross purposes. Farmers get government payments or aid to make arid land useful through irrigation and to take land out of production.

The study broke the subsidies down into these broad areas:

Agriculture, $5 billion; food subsidies for the poor or for schoolchildren, $2.5 billion; medical care, including tax deductions for some medical expenses, $9 billion; higher education, $3.5 billion; manpower programs, including job training, $2.5 billion; international trade, $1 billion; housing, $8 billion; natural resources, including the oil depletion allowance to spur oil exploration, $3 billion; transportation, $1 billion, and commerce and economic development, $20 billion.

The study ran to 221 pages and is only the first of 40 detailed studies to be produced by the committee this year.

The Facts Refute Myths About Welfare Recipients

Fewer than 1 percent of the persons on welfare rolls in the U.S. are able-bodied males, and most of them — about 80 percent — would work if they could find a job. About half of them are enrolled in work training programs.

That fact is but one of nine brought out in a pamphlet issued recently by the U.S. Dept. of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW). The pamphlet, entitled "Welfare Myths vs. Facts," was published for the purpose of exploding some of the myths about people receiving public assistance.

Not only do those myths make the victims of poverty look bad, but they also malign those social workers who are trying to make the present welfare system work, John D. Twiname, administrator of the HEW Social and Rehabilitation Service, explains.

Following are the nine myths about welfare and the facts which are substantiated by official statistics compiled by the government:

Myth: Welfare families are loaded with kids — and have more just to get more money.

Fact: The typical welfare family has a mother and three children. The birth rate for welfare families, like the birth rate for the general population, is dropping. Studies show that the majority of welfare children were conceived or born before the family applied for assistance. Also, the typical payment for an additional child is $35 a month, hardly enough to cover the cost of rearing an additional child. Some states impose maximum payment limits; usually a 4- to 5-person family gets no additional money for another child.

Myth: Most welfare families are black.

Fact: The largest racial group among welfare families—49 percent — is white. Blacks represent about 46 percent. Most of the remaining 5 percent are American Indians, Orientals, and other racial minorities. Latin-American families cut across racial lines; 14.4 percent of AFDC families are of Latin birth or ancestry: Mexican, Cuban, Venezuelan, etc.

Families headed by females account for most of those on welfare—black or white. Studies have shown that such families are less able to survive economically than those with both parents present, regardless of race.

Myth: Why work when you can live it up on welfare?

Fact: The average payment to a welfare family of four with no other income varies among states, from a low of $60 per month in Mississippi to a high of $375 per month in Alaska.

In all but four states, welfare payments have been below the established poverty level of $331 per month, or $3,972 per year, for a family of four.

Myth: Welfare's just a dole, a money handout.

Fact: Money is necessary to a family lacking subsistence, but it usually takes more than just cash to help the typical welfare family get on its feet and back into the mainstream of our society. Welfare families also receive one or more social services such as health care advice, financial counseling, employment counseling, and services to secure child support, to improve housing conditions and to continue school.

Myth: The welfare rolls are full of able-bodied loafers!

Fact: Less than 1 percent of welfare recipients are able-bodied unemployed males. Most of them—80 percent—want work. About half the men are enrolled in work training programs.

The largest group of working-age adults on welfare are 2.5 million mothers of welfare families, most of whom head families with no able-bodied male present. About 14 percent of these mothers work, and 7 percent are in work training. If day care were available for their children, and if job training and jobs were to be had, it is estimated that another 35 percent would be potential employes. Seventy to 80 percent of welfare mothers consistently report they would work if present barriers to employment are overcome.

Myth: Give them more money and they'll spend it on drink and big cars.

Fact: Most welfare families report that if they received any extra money it would go for essentials. A survey of welfare mothers showed that almost half would spend it primarily for food. Another 28 percent said they would spend any additional money on clothing and shoes. The survey found that 42 percent of mothers bought used clothing or relied on donated clothing to help make ends meet. Seventeen percent of the mothers said their children occasionally stayed home from school because they lacked decent clothes and shoes.

Nearly 10 percent of the mothers in the survey said they would spend extra money on rent for better housing, and 13 percent said they would spend it on a combination of food, clothes and rent.

Myth: Most welfare children are illegitimate.

Fact: A sizable majority — approximately 68 percent — of the more than 7 million children in welfare families were born in wedlock.

Myth: Once on welfare, always on welfare.

Fact: The average family has been on the rolls for 23 months. The number of long-term cases is relatively small — only 7.3 percent have been on welfare for 10 years or more. Such cases are likely to involve some form of disability. Surveys show that the majority of welfare families are also embarrassed by welfare. Most want to move off the welfare rolls, but it takes the average family about two years to overcome its problems.

Myth: Welfare people are cheats.

Fact: Suspected incidents of fraud or misrepresentation among welfare recipients occur in less than four-tenths of 1 percent of the total welfare caseload in the nation. Cases where fraud is established occur even less frequently. The overwhelming majority of recipients are not wilfully misrepresenting their situations.

Those are the facts. The next time you hear someone launch a tirade about welfare recipients being cheaters and too lazy to work, or characterizing them as people having illegitimate children merely to collect additional welfare money, lay a few facts on them. Explode those welfare myths!

Welfare: Separating Myth and Fact

By RICHARD A. SNYDER

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare, apparently stung by taxpayer criticism of ever-more-costly welfare programs, has published a booklet in its own defense. Like any piece of propaganda, it may tell us something about its creator. It certainly doesn't contribute much clarity to the confusion surrounding welfare and its dilemmas.

The booklet, "Welfare Myths vs. Facts," has been widely circulated by the department and has served as the basis for a number of newspaper articles. It purports to explode "popular misconceptions" about welfare and welfare recipients.

Such misconceptions "not only malign the victims of poverty but the social workers who labor with dedication to make the present inadequate welfare system work," says John D. Twiname, HEW's Social and Rehabilitation Service administrator, in the pamphlet.

While conceding that the current system is indeed inadequate (and putting in a plug for the Nixon welfare reform legislation), the booklet nonetheless argues that the present system is being unfairly criticized by those who suggest, for example, that many welfare recipients are lazy or unethical.

Or, as the HEW frames the proposition:

"Myth: The welfare rolls are full of able-bodied loafers!"

"Fact: Less than 1% of welfare recipients are able-bodied unemployed males."

Are Statistics Accurate?

Even if that statistic is accurate it is deceptive, for it implies that finding jobs for these men would have a negligible effect on welfare. The fact is that there is an average 3.7 persons per family on relief, which means that this percentage, rather than 1%, would move off the rolls if the breadwinner went to work.

But is the figure accurate? Or has HEW been too generous in interpreting who is "able-bodied"? For example, it recently came to light that the Pennsylvania Department of Public Welfare had entered into a formal plan with HEW's regional office in Philadelphia to permit any physical impairment of either parent—however trivial—to qualify the family for federal and state funds under the federal work incentive program. Those with no more impairment than the need for eyeglasses qualify the family for cash, food stamps and free medical aid.

Emphasis on males alone is also misleading. It ignores the mothers, a huge and largely untapped work force. As Blanche Bernstein of the New School for Social Research in New York City has pointed out, about 25% of the welfare mothers in New York City, for example, have at least a high school education, making them eligible for many jobs advertised. Half of all mothers have only one or two children, making day-care arrangements feasible.

As part of its denial that many welfare recipients are employable, HEW makes the point that mothers and children get most of the money spent for welfare.

This is true in the sense that Mother cashes the check. However, the indirect but actual beneficiary is more often the absent father. If he leaves his family and lives alone he can spend all his wages on himself, a comfortable equivalent of bachelorhood. If he lives with a woman who is not his wife, he is similarly favored in an economic sense, especially if she is on welfare or employed and their incomes are merged. If he makes clandestine visits to his own home, his paycheck and his wife's welfare check in combination give the outwardly separated family a double income.

There are cases, of course, where the mother is widowed, or the father is ill, imprisoned or otherwise incapacitated. But these do not explain why deserted families on welfare increased from 12,000 to 80,000 in New York City within seven years. Responsible sociological opinion, typified by Nathan Glazer of Harvard, points out that there is a cash incentive to break up the family, or not to form it. For example, the unwed mother on welfare and the putative father on wages would lose her income if they marry.

For years welfare apologists prefaced any discussion of relief with references to the "aged, blind and disabled," which made any criticism of welfare seem hard-hearted. Now that these have become a bare quarter of the whole cost, the stress has been on children and mothers, with discreet avoidance of the men whose escape brought about the situation.

Another straw man from the HEW booklet:

"Myth: Give them more money and they'll spend it on drink and big cars."

"Fact: Most welfare families report (in an HEW survey) that if they received any extra money it would go for essentials."

One can hardly imagine a recipient testifying otherwise, at least in any inquiry conducted by the department. Other random surveys, however, have disclosed push-button telephones, stereos, new and expensive furniture in homes receiving public assistance, and other luxuries purchased with public assistance grants. Credit is often readily available to public assistance recipients because merchants have confidence in the flow of funds.

HEW has special difficulty in encouraging good judgment in spending because the current thrust in welfare is to separate the computing of eligibility from the rendering of social services, such as advice on budgeting, family management, child care, homemaking and employment. It is a tenet that the recipient should not be submitted to the "indignity" of having such advice thrust upon him.

"Myth: Once on welfare, always on welfare."

"Fact: The average welfare family has been on the rolls for 23 months. . . . The number of long-term cases is relatively small."

The department's own figures don't wholly confirm its position. By its charts, more than a third of those on welfare have been there three years or more. HEW personnel admit, moreover, that this does not take into account "repeaters" who have been on for varying periods previously.

In fact, "on-again, off-again" welfare is the case with many recipients, as local administrators acknowledge. For these families, welfare becomes the quickest port of call in any emergency. The easy availability diminishes the likelihood that the recipient will be resourceful, take part-time or overtime work to bridge the gap, or solicit help from relatives.

Unto the Third Generation?

The most familiar situation in which welfare has become a way of life is the young unwed mother and her child. And when the child in turn becomes an adolescent and becomes pregnant, a third welfare generation has begun.

According to HEW's pamphlet, 32% of the more than 7 million children in welfare families were born out of wedlock, and these demonstrably constitute much of the caseload that is either on relief on a long-term basis or at recurring intervals.

HEW puts the average length of time a family is on welfare at 23 months, but information in the files of Chairman Wilbur Mills' House Ways and Means Committee establishes the figure at 42 months; this figure would be even greater if welfare rolls weren't growing so fast.

There is an astonishing lack of data in HEW with respect to how long the closed cases had been on welfare (the department says no studies have ever been made in this area), and data on this group is needed for an accurate index. Any figure based on those on relief at any given point in time also obviously doesn't include the prospective remaining period each case will be on the rolls, nor does it include any period present recipients may have been on the rolls prior to that point in time.

A more immediate question involves the 14.5 million on welfare: To what extent are their incomes accurately measured?

Dr. Bernstein and others have pointed out that figures on poverty and low incomes aren't reliable. Many families are prone to report net rather than gross figures and to be inexact about part-time earnings and teenagers' income. Or the wife is frequently the source of information about her husband's income but is ill-informed about it. In other words, many families commendably have income from assorted sources, which brings them slightly above the poverty line, although the statistics provided show they are below it.

This also serves to explain in part why many in rural and small-town America would be shocked to be told that they are in poverty. They live frugally but [illegible]

This also serves to explain in part why many in rural and small-town America would be shocked to be told that they are in poverty. They live frugally but to their own satisfaction on limited resources, or sometimes on help from kin. Census figures are thrown out of kilter by the Amish farmers, for example, who would classify as underprivileged if measured by the absence of radios, TVs or cars, but who manage to earn sufficient income to buy expensive farms for their sons.

Bismarck is reputed to have said that people are happiest if they know little about how their laws and sausages are made. He might have included welfare administration. What is everyone's business has become no one's business except the social scientists', and they haven't given satisfying answers.

Burgeoning Demands

Legislators, at the state level particularly, are becoming frustrated by the burgeoning demands of welfare, which drains educational and other parts of the state budget. And they bear the lament of taxpayers who feel the pinch of welfare and other costs. States, responding to grass-root pressure, cut back on grants. HEW, with its pamphlets, seeks to justify its system.

Welfare is an enormously complex issue, and one that tends to arouse strong emotions in all concerned—from the needy recipient to the taxpayer who foots the bill. Any progress toward a solution of what society can and should do to care for its destitute—a solution that has evaded man since the beginning of history—will be made only through cool rationality.

It is natural that HEW react defensively to criticism and state its case positively. It would be unrealistic to expect it to quote Edward C. Banfield of Harvard, for example, to the effect that current welfare policies encourage idleness, dishonesty and reduced production.

The public has, however, a right to accuracy and objectivity, and HEW propaganda broadsides such as "Welfare Myths vs. Facts" are no help at all.

Prudence and the Poor

W-S-J

One of the trickiest features of the administration's welfare reform proposals is the one that would supply welfare benefits to the "working poor."

Such benefits might serve their intended purpose of encouraging recipients to find jobs and of relieving the resentments the working poor feel towards the non-workers who live almost as well by means of welfare aid. On the other hand, subsidization of the working poor might in practice prove to be really subsidization of penurious employers. If the latter proved to be the case, another extremely costly federal program would have misfired.

It thus is encouraging that the President has agreed with Sen. Ribicoff (D., Conn.) that the working poor provisions of welfare reform be pilot tested before a full-scale welfare reform program is put into effect. Sen. Ribicoff has been a staunch supporter of welfare reform, but his pilot test proposal indicates that he is sensitive to the misgivings that have been expressed by Senate critics of the reform.

It is, of course, possible that welfare reform, even with the pilot testing provision, will have a great deal of difficulty getting through the Senate. And there is no certainty that pilot testing over a limited time would answer all the questions that need to be answered about income maintenance concepts.

But pilot testing deserves far greater use in government than it has had in the past. An auto company management that tooled up to build a radically new car without first building a prototype and running it thousands of miles on the test track would be thought daft, and rightly so. Social programs are more complex than automobiles, involving as they do human motivations and intricate interactions. When they are attempted on a national scale—which is happening more frequently as the federal government expands its role in the so-called "people program" area—a misfire can squander enormous resources.

We are not sure what will come of welfare reform. Certainly there is an urgent need to rationalize the present system of coping with the problems of the needy. But it would be a mistake to assume that matters are so urgent that major changes should be introduced without careful debate and testing.

After the record of the 1960s, one thing should be clear. It is cheaper and safer for everyone if Congress and the administration take the time to examine programs with extreme care before pushing them into law. When they don't, the country often faces a hard and protracted recovery from the lack of prudence.

The Welfare 'Test'

The Nixon administration and Senator Ribicoff have negotiated a trial run for the part of the administration's welfare reform plan that would make payments to the working poor. Fine. Now, the next step is to figure out how to tell whether the plan passes or fails once the results of the test are in.

Will the plan be a success if it raises the incomes of the working poor? Or will the measure of success be that it costs no more than the estimates? Or to succeed in the test, must the plan demonstrate persuasively that supporting the working poor reduces the number of non-working poor on the welfare rolls? Or will the trial run be a success if it seems merely to reduce the rate of growth in those rolls?

In other words, what is it we want welfare reform to accomplish? We say this at the risk of being tedious, for we have been asking the same question through two years of welfare debates. Yet not only has the question never been answered, it has been all but ignored. Proponents of reform argue the present system is a mess, which is certainly true, but they persistently refuse to recognize that the problems are real, requiring not merely good faith but also hard choices.

No test will make the choices go away. As a matter of fact, enough research has already been done to allow a pretty good guess of what a trial run will show about how low-wage workers will react to supplementary payments: They will stop working as much overtime as they now do.

Where would that result leave us? Apparently the working poor would not react to a guaranteed annual income by dropping out of the labor force, at least in the short run (and it's hard to conceive a test that would tell us anything about the long run). Certainly life would be more nearly fair if low-wage earners did not need to work longer hours than most of us. Yet if they reduce their working hours and thus their income when they receive supplements, the government is going to be rowing upstream trying to raise their incomes and lift them out of poverty.

When such complexities are likely, it's all the more important to have a clear purpose in mind. So far as we are concerned, the problem welfare reform ought to be trying to solve is the creation of a permanent non-working class, cut off not only from the economic system but from the social bonds and attachments that work carries. The specter of such a class has been writ large in the explosive growth of the welfare rolls during the 1960s.

The surface test of whether welfare reform is succeeding, then, is whether it restrains growth in whatever part of the welfare rolls represents non-workers. As it happens, the growth has been pretty well contained in the last year or so as the states reacted to budget pressures. In our minds this makes the pressure for federal-level reform far less acute, though there are still good arguments for cleaning up the inconsistencies and often perverse incentives that result from the present patchwork of federal and state welfare laws.

If there is to be federal reform, though, its design needs to recognize what the states' experience in the last year or so again demonstrates, that there are two basic ways to keep welfare caseloads within some bounds. One is keeping benefit levels low enough so that they do not compete with low-level wages. The other is heavy administrative pressure toward putting recipients to work.

The administration purports to favor strong work rules, and the version of its bill written by the House Ways and Means Committee in fact takes useful steps toward stronger administration. The ardent liberal backers of the bill find neither remedy acceptable, though; they want both high benefits and lenient ("humane") administration. With these differences, it's easy enough to see why none of the backers want to talk much about first principles. Their uneasy coalition could easily be torn asunder by harsh reality.

Bringing talk about first principles out in the open might be the best possible result of the proposed trial run. Further research might not tell us much we don't already know, but the task of deciding in advance what constitutes success and what constitutes failure brings everyone face to face with the questions that need to be asked. It's going to be hard to design a sensible reform plan, after all, so long as those designing it haven't agreed on what they're trying to do.

INFLATION HAS SHARP TEETH

Social Security Called Leaky Umbrella

An INSIDE REPORT

By JOHN T. WHEELER

WASHINGTON (AP) — By the millions, America's aged wait each month on faded front porches, at windows commanding the sidewalk or in often dangerous apartment house halls near the mailbox.

It is the day most need no red circle around a calendar to remember. It is the day for the Social Security check, a paying back of money they or their spouses gave through their working lives in trust to the government.

They often wait in fear that through some horrible mistake—and there are few—a computer or the mails will betray them. And that green punch card Treasury check is all that prevents them from sliding into economic chaos.

There are other days they wait for welfare checks or funds from their children.

If it all comes together, if there are no unexpected medical bills or other unforeseen major expenses, then the millions of retired poor and near poor can scrape along somehow for another month with disaster averted.

But Social Security was never meant to make America's elderly financially secure. The name of the sprawling bureaucracy was only a catch phrase dropped into the public relations mill in the mid-1930s. It is a mandatory social insurance program that assures no standard of living or even a living at all. It guarantees only against total loss of income in case of death, disability or retirement of breadwinners.

The present program is under attacks of varying intensity from the White House, congressional liberals and moderates, and lobbyists for the 20.7 million persons over 65, of whom 93 per cent draw Social Security benefits. The intensifying debate spotlights problems and apparent inequities together with fundamental questions about how relevant the Depression-era program is in an America with a trillion-dollar-plus-economy. Among them:

—Social Security was designed intentionally to provide relatively low payouts so as "not to rob the working man of his incentive to save." Yet, in many states, the average Social Security benefit by itself is less than aged persons ing, and you think you have protection. And you open it up, and the rain comes right through."

Born in the Great Depression, the program was envisioned only as providing a cornerstone to build retirement on. President Franklin D. Roosevelt, in signing the bill, said: "We can never insure 100 per cent of the population against 100 per cent of the hazards and vicissitudes of life, but we have tried to frame a law which will give some measure of protection to the average citizen and his family against the loss of job and against poverty-ridden old age."

In a separate note, the President noted: "While the amounts provided in the act do not give the amount of insurance and protection which I should like to see, it is a definite beginning."

The average monthly benefit in the early years was $15 a month. Not it is $131.

Today the fundamental concept of Social Security is being attacked, and defended, as seldom before since enactment.

The crucial philosophical issue: Should Social Security continue as an almost wholly payroll tax - supported program or be beefed up with infusions of general revenue funds as happens in West Europe? Should those who have worked their entire adult lives, albeit in relatively low paying jobs, be free of the indignity of welfare since they followed as best they could the American ethnic of hard work and self - reliance?

This year, the payroll tax went up again from a maximum of $450.50 to $468 per year. Under present law, that maximum will climb to $544.50 by 1987. But pending legislation would make even these increases seem small for those in upper pay brackets. A bill sponsored by Rep. Wilbur Mills, the head of the House Ways and Means Committee, would push maximum payroll taxes up 128.5 per cent higher on top salaries. Estimated payouts would soar as well, up to a $1,118.20 monthly maximum for a single retired worker.

But his pending legislation, which is supported by the White House, would do little for those already retired. The men and women talk of the need for increase of from 25 to 50 per cent over a few years to catch up with what is to them an ever more elusive minimum standard of living.

A major increase in Sociel Security payouts almost certainly would mean fundamental changes in the program now financed almost entirely by the payroll tax. Lobbyists for the aged, including the AFL-CIO, talk of tapping the Treasury to boost available plan would cost about $17 billion annually today and is violently opposed by uch groups as the U.S. Chamber of Comfunds by 50 per cent. Such a merce and the National Association of Manufacturers.

"General funds must and will be drawn into the Social Security trust fund," says William Hutton, executive director of the Washington-based National Council of Senior Citizens.

"Now Social Security is no security at all for old people. Under the present system it is a slow walk to poverty as meager savings are eaten up.But it's slow only if an oldster's health holds-.Otherwise it's a dead run to the poor house.

"We're a great natin with a trillion-dollar economy, but we've fallen behind 16 Western industrial nations in Europe on securing the aged-.People are starving in the United States and people are dying needlessly because they can't afford proper food, medicines and long term medical care. How can anyone justify this?"

In Britain, pensions can run about 50 per cent of the average wage. In Sweden, it is roughly 75 per cent. The achievement of a 75 per cent level in the United States would roughly triple present payroll deductions and wipe out the present $9,000 ceiling. Those advocating major improvements say there would be a working man's revolt if such taxes were imposed and losophy" on which Social Security was founded and still operates. They argue the nation's social consciousness has expanded dramatically but unevenly in postwar America to the point that those who live on welfare can live far better than those who worked their entire adult lives and now depend entirely on Social Security

In New York, for instance, a single person 65 years old qualifies for an average of $185 a month and a couple could get $243. In New Jersey, a couple would get about $242 and $6 a month per person for food stamps. As in most states, Social Security recipients who do apply for welfare get no more than those dependent wholly on welfare. The amount of the Social Security check is deducted from the welfare check they would receive if there was no other income.

One argument, that is echoed in many quarters, including the halls of Congress, is that the system is rigged to take advantage of the aged's aversion to welfare and their poliitcal quiessence.

Hutton specifically mentioned food stamps which many of the aged consider the most demeaning of the welfare programs. In interviews they said that as embarrassing as it was to convince local welfare workers of their poverty, showing up in the local supermarkets with food stamps degraded them before friends and neighbors.

Food stamps, under a program to start this year, can mean a saving of nearly 50 per cent for couples with the lowest Social Security incomes and 10 per cent for couples nudging the $222-a-month maximum income set by Washington. The stamps are purchased through welfare at discount. For instance, a couple with $131 income would get $60 worth of stamps for $3.

Welfare, just as Roosevelt envisioned it, is the back-up program for the retired. Under pending legislation given fair chances for enactment, Old Age Assistance, now administered by the states, would be abolished and a $150-month "floor" would be built under the aged. Food stamps also would be abolished.

The problem with Old Age Assistance, many sources agree, is that older Americans feel it is demeaning to go on welfare.

Many conflicts of the multi-program approach may be wiped out when and if the Mills bill finally reaches President Nixon's desk. The measure combines the President's requested welfare reforms with an overhaul of the Social Security system, including an immediate 5 per cent benefit increase. The bill is stalled in the Senate because of opposition to the welfare portions of the measure.

Top payments for those in upper income brackets would jump to $1,215.90 a month per couple by the year 2000 from the present $426.60 a month. Estimates for median payments include jumps of 56 per cent by 1985 and by just over 100 per cent in 1995.

The Mills bill also includes provisions for automatic cost of living increases under certain circumstances. But even the Mills bill would not guarantee all oldsters will cross the poverty line. More than half of single retired persons probably would remain below the line even assuming there is no further inflationary pressure on the dollar.

For broader Social Security reforms, with far less chance of any immediate success have been proposed, notably by Democratic presidential hopefuls Sen. Edmund Muskie and Hubert H. Humphrey. Their plan would bring massive amounts of direct federal budgetary support to Social Security. "It would," said one lobbyist, "give everyone else in the country the same treatment as congressmen and the president now enjoy. Ever hear of a retired congressman on welfare?"

Some of those opposed to further expansion or tinkering with Social Security say there are plenty of private options open to those who seek an adequate income on retirement.

or even a living at all. It guarantees only against total loss of income in case of death, disability or retirement of breadwinners.

The present program is under attacks of varying intensity from the White House, congressional liberals and moderates, and lobbyists for the 20.7 million persons over 65, of whom 93 per cent draw Social Security benefits. The intensifying debate spotlights problems and apparent inequities together with fundamental questions about how relevant the Depression-era program is in an America with a trillion-dollar-plus-economy. Among them:

—Social Security was designed intentionally to provide relatively low payouts so as "not to rob the working man of his incentive to save." Yet, in many states, the average Social Security benefit by itself is less than aged persons get on welfare alone.

—Federal figures show Social Security checks to some 73 per cent of the single elderly leave them below the poverty mark. The majority of couples hover at the same mark. In all, three million to four million aged are below the poverty line and six of 10 persons on welfare are Social Security recipients.

—While the cost of living has risen 281 per cent since the program began, Social Security benefits have jumped 596 per cent. But the eldegly and their lobbyists contend in the past two decades alone the portion of the aged's budget covered by the federal payments has slid from one-half to about one-third.

Welfare rolls are open to many on Social Security but the benefits are passed up by hundreds of thousands, usually because of the stigma welfare carries.

—The White House Conference on the Aging reported that to bring all those over 65 up to a minimum standard of living would cost $55 billion more a year. This would be a 50 per cent increase over present Social Security payments.

Pension plans and annuities for today's retired workers cover but few at the bottom of the economic ladder. And those who are covered have seen inflation take shark-like bites out of their dreams for "the golden years" of retirement.

—Militancy among the aged is up, and in the 1972 presidential year their voices are being heeded. But even the expected 5 per cent increase in benefits will mean only $6.51 a month more to the average old age beneficiary.

—Social Security's newest field, medicare, is credited with prolonging the lives and with easing the last years for hundreds of thousands. But critics contend there are unneeded financial barriers blocking many from meaningful medical insurance.

—Most other Western industrial nations, including Britain and Sweden, dip into federal revenues to bring their elderly a proportionately far better standard of living. The United States depends almost entirely on the payroll tax.

Social Security, American style, was summed up for many retirees by a New Jersey senior citizens' club leader in testimony before a congressional committee. It is, he said, "like a leaking umbrella. You go outside when it is rain-lives, albeit in relatively low paying jobs, be free of the indignity of welfare since they followed as best they could the American ethnic of hard work and self - reliance?

This year, the payroll tax went up again from a maximum of $450.50 to $468 per year. Under present law, that maximum will climb to $544.50 by 1987. But pending legislation would make even these increases seem small for those in upper pay brackets. A bill sponsored by Rep. Wilbur Mills, the head of the House Ways and Means Committee, would push maximum payroll taxes up 128.5 per cent higher on top salaries. Estimated payouts would soar as well, up to a $1,118.20 monthly maximum for a single retired worker.

But his pending legislation, which is supported by the White House, would do little for those already retired. The proposed 5 per cent increase will mean but little $3.52 a month, to those with the $70.40 minimum benefit. The maximum for single persons is $313.10.

"Not enough," cry pensioners and leaders of increasingly militant organizations representing the aged. These up.But it's slow only if an oldster's health holds-.Otherwise it's a dead run to the poor house.

"We're a great natin with a trillion-dollar economy, but we've fallen behind 16 Western industrial nations in Europe on securing the aged-.People are starving in the United States and people are dying needlessly because they can't afford proper food, medicines and long term medical care. How can anyone justify this?"

In Britain, pensions can run about 50 per cent of the average wage. In Sweden, it is roughly 75 per cent. The achievement of a 75 per cent level in the United States would roughly triple present payroll deductions and wipe out the present $9,000 ceiling. Those advocating major improvements say there would be a working man's revolt if such taxes were imposed and that only general revenues — which workers would have to help pay but not so visibly — can be made politically palatable.

In testimony before congressional committees, advocates for the aged repeatedly call for scrapping of what they term the "Depression-Era phi-

Should Blacks Get Special Social Security Benefits?

OCAW Union News 3/'72

By SYLVIA PORTER

SHOULD the official retirement age for blacks to become eligible for full Social Security-Medicare benefits be lowered from today's 65 to 58?

Should our present Social Security laws be amended to give sharp raises in benefits to black retirees, their widows and their dependents?

Don't sputter! Responsible leaders of the elderly blacks are seriously pressing for moves along these lines — and the issue of a lower Social Security eligibility age for blacks was submitted for debate at the recent White House Conference on Aging.

To my mind, anything even approaching this would be a step toward disaster, would open up hideous traps, would actually endanger our entire Social Security system — and would almost surely be condemned as illegal under our anti-discrimination laws.

Nevertheless, "The average black man doesn't even live long enough to collect his Social Security," argued Dr. Inabel Lindsay, retired dean of the Howard University School of Social Work, at a meeting of elderly blacks in Washington in November. And Dr. Lindsay submitted some startling statistics:

- The mortality rate for black women in the pre-retirement 45-64 age bracket today is approximately twice the rate for white women and the rate is more than 10 percent greater for black men approaching retirement age than for white men.

- The statistical life expectancy for black males today is 60.1 years against 67.5 years for white males. That means the Negro male is likely to be dead a full year before he even qualifies for reduced Social Security retirement benefits and four years before he qualifies for full retirement or for Medicare benefits. Dr. Lindsay's poignant remark has a sombre background indeed.

- As a result of the statistics above, a black man may be required to pay his full share of Social Security-Medicare taxes throughout his working life, but then simply not live long enough to collect 1 cent of the benefits for which his taxes have paid.

According to a recent study by the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare in Washington, only one in three aged blacks collects any benefits at all from the Medicare coverage for which he or she is fully eligible and for which they have paid a full share of taxes. And this is so despite the well-known fact that the blacks among us tend to suffer a far greater share of ill health than whites — particularly the elderly black whose health needs may have been almost totally neglected in earlier years.

Among those blacks who do survive to 65 and beyond, fully half live below the official poverty line of $1,852 for an individual and $2,328 for a couple.

ONE reason for this abysmally high poverty "risk," of course, is the black citizen's generally lower level of education, training and skills. A second is the still rampant discrimination in terms of jobs and pay.

A third, not so obvious explanation for today's poverty crisis among blacks is the fact that when our original Social Security law was passed during the 1930s, blacks were working primarily in two of the key occupations not covered by the law: domestic service and agriculture. It was not until nearly two decades later, that most black workers entered the system.

And a fourth reason why so many blacks receive either minimal or no Social Security benefits is their still pervasive attitude of mistrust toward the system. Many household workers continue to persuade their employers not to report or to pay Social Security taxes on their incomes—and many household employers continue to shamefully cooperate in this tragic deception NOT of the government but of the household worker.

The answer to the acute problem of the poor elderly black is not preferential treatment — as Dr. Lindsay's call for special Social Security benefits implies. It's equal treatment. Maybe just these disclosures will help a bit.

Rise in Welfare For Three Groups Clears Senate Unit

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—The Senate Finance Committee voted to increase welfare payments to the aged, blind and disabled sufficiently to raise 3.5 million of them above the poverty line.

The committee approved a plan to guarantee a federal cash payment of $130 a month to persons in these three categories. The plan would allow recipients to disregard the first $50 of any retirement income plus $50 of earned income and half of any remaining income in collecting the guaranteed minimum.

At present, the average cash payment for an elderly person on welfare is $76 a month. The figure varies from state to state.

The committee proposal would add $4.2 billion to the federal cost of welfare, $1.5 billion more than a comparable package in a welfare-reform plan passed by the House.

Sen. Russell Long (D., La.), committee chairman, said the panel probably will approve an across-the-board increase of at least 10% in Social Security retirement benefits, compared with a 5% boost voted by the House. The Senate committee still has to decide how to finance the increases.

Last month the committee voted to raise to $200 from the present $133 the minimum monthly Social Security retirement benefit for a person who has worked 30 years.

Italia's Labor Troubles

Liberalized welfare payments for the aged, blind and disabled were approved, 11-0, by the Senate Finance Committee. Under the plan, all persons in the three categories would be guaranteed $130 a month from the federal government if they had no other income. An individual wouldn't lose any welfare payment for the first $50 he draws from Social Security or from the first $50 he earns. Payments or earnings above $100 would diminish his welfare check, and if he had $360 in monthly income, he would be ineligible for welfare.

A Radical, Direct, Simple, Utopian Alternative To Day-Care Centers

By WILLIAM V. SHANNON

Drawing by Chas. B. Slackman.

Uncle Sam as the nation's babysitter—just what the great majority of children don't need, according to the author.

WASHINGTON.

I must share the view of those of its supporters who proclaim this to be the most radical piece of legislation to emerge from the 92d Congress.

I also hold the conviction that such far-reaching national legislation should not, must not, be enacted in the absence of a great national debate upon its merit and broad public acceptance of its principles.

Few contend that such a national debate has taken place.

—PRESIDENT NIXON,
in a veto message.

One of the most irresponsible statements I have seen in my many years in public life . . . cruel, hysterical and false.

—SENATOR WALTER MONDALE,
commenting on the veto message.

LAST Dec. 9, President Nixon vetoed an antipoverty bill which had as its major component the Comprehensive Child Development Act of 1971, sponsored by Senators Walter Mondale, Minnesota Democrat, and Jacob Javits, New York Republican. The child-development bill, one of the most far-reaching measures ever passed by Congress, ranking in financial cost and social implications with Medicare or Federal aid to education, deserves much more thorough discussion than it has received. The bill has never been the subject of a question at one of Mr. Nixon's (admittedly infrequent) news conferences. It is rarely, if ever, brought up during Sunday TV interviews, in which his Democratic rivals are regular participants. It rarely made the front page of any newspaper until Mr. Nixon vetoed it.

The "great national debate" which President Nixon called for has not taken place but the legislative scene has already been set for passing the bill again. Ignoring G.O.P. predictions of a second Nixon veto, the House of Representatives on Feb. 17 approved a poverty bill which includes a much expanded Head Start program and which Senator Mondale intends to use as a vehicle for adding a revised version of his child-development plan.

If another bill passes Congress this year, President Nixon is sure to veto it again, and conservatives have the votes to sustain that veto. Over the longer term, however, a bill bearing some resemblance to Mondale's is likely, sooner or later, to become law. The political arithmetic of the growing number of working mothers guarantees that.

If the centers set up under such a law are adequately financed, ideally staffed and well run, they would, in my judgment, help some of those youngsters who are the worst victims of poverty and neglect. The centers are, however, neither necessary nor desirable for the great majority of children. Moreover, because they are likely to be underfinanced, understaffed and overcrowded, I sincerely doubt they will achieve many of their objectives. Unless Congress undergoes a radical change of heart, it will try to do a $30-billion job on a $3-billion budget.

Although I am a liberal, I do not share the liberal enthusiasm for day-care centers. Such centers are not a satisfactory or desirable substitute for the full-time care and devotion of a child's own mother. President Nixon may have politically expedient motives of his own, but I nevertheless agree with the premise of his veto message, which stated: "All other factors being equal, good public policy requires that we enhance rather than diminish both parental authority and parental involvement with children—particularly in those decisive early years when social attitudes and a conscience are formed, and religious and moral principles are first inculcated."

Liberals may deprecate these Nixon words as all wet and reactionary, but much hard-earned human wisdom lies behind them. Excessive emphasis on day-care centers can weaken the family at a time when it needs strengthening. Having said that, however, I do not think the status quo is good enough. I have a radical proposal of my own to advance. It would be an alternative to day care that would enable the poor and the working poor—except those families which are most severely deprived and damaged psychologically—to take care of their own children.

But before advancing my own views, I shall set forth the argument of the advocates of comprehensive child-development

ROUGH STUFF—Seedman forces a prisoner to face the camera, a 1962 incident that prompted the New York Civil Liberties Union to demand his reprimand for "abuse"—no action was taken.

It Is Very Hard To Smile at Albert Seedman When He Is Not Smiling at You

By PETER HELLMAN

AT 6:20 one morning last September, Albert Seedman, the city's chief of detectives, called me from his home on Long Island to say in a low but not at all sleepy voice: "We had a good one last night in Central Park. Meet me at the 86th Street station house at 8."

To go to a murder in Central Park on a fine morning in late summer is at first a little surreal. Seedman, having slept in the back of his official car for most of the slow 30 miles in on the expressway and then having started on his first cigar of the day, is clearly enjoying the walk from the station house into the park; dew is still not warmed off the grass and the sunlight is crisp in the trees. The path is empty until we stroll over a knoll to a meadow beside Belvedere Lake. Here the place is suddenly busy with patrol cars, unmarked cars, coroner's and photo-unit vehicles, news-media wagons. Cops are everywhere, prowling the bushes, writing reports, chatting, running from tree to tree marking off areas with ropes and signs that say, "Crime scene search area. Stop."

A deputy inspector gives Seedman the rundown: A 20-year-old Puerto Rican man and a 17-year-old black girl just up from South Carolina—neither of whom apparently knew any better than to be in the park at 2 A.M.—were accosted by two white men as they sat by the lake. When the Puerto Rican, Reuben Ortiz, protested the impending rape of the girl (she said later that he was a homosexual), he was shot between the eyes. When the man who did not shoot protested the murder, his partner shot him in the throat—he would die later in the hospital. Then, after she had been raped by the gunman, the girl was shot, tied up and left to die by the lake. It took her three hours to hop in a trail of blood up to the road where a patrol car found her at dawn.

Seedman starts to climb down the deceptively steep black rocks that slope to the lake. Somehow, with so many cars parked helter-skelter around the meadow and so many people rushing about, it is almost an anticlimax that down here beside the murky water is the center of all this activity — the body of Ortiz, under a red-checkered, vinyl picnic cloth. Despite the morning light he appears to be one-dimensional; he looks painted on the rock. A reporter from C.B.S. turns away and gags. Even the deputy inspector looks out into the distance. But Seedman stares down at the body for half a minute, puffing his cigar, as if he were contemplating a chessboard or an ant colony. Finally he shakes his head and says to nobody in particular, "What in hell is a girl like that doing with a guy like this?"

ALBERT SEEDMAN runs the largest municipal detective bureau in the world; at 2,900 men, it is larger than all but a dozen entire police departments. In his 13 months on the job he has taken personal charge of a half-dozen spectacular investigations, ranging from the shootings of Joe Colombo and Joe Gallo to a pair of double murders of policemen and the holdup in the Hampshire House at which Sophia Loren lost her jewels—this last case including an interrogation of the victim which, to the surprise of nobody who works for him, he did not delegate. In a period when Commissioner Patrick Murphy has shown little interest in keeping the old-line, over-50 segment of the force around, the 54-year-old Seedman has stayed on top. While other senior cops have been forced into retirement in the drive to root out corruption, Seedman managed to survive even the report that he had let the Hilton pick up the $83 tab for a dinner he hosted on the premises.

In addition, Seedman has been responsible for a momentous, if unspectacular, reshaping of the traditional division of labor between patrol and detective forces, as a result of which patrolmen, he hopes, will do more of their own spadework and detectives will be free for more specialized investigating. Seedman has also had to contend with a local homicide rate which has risen 30 per cent in the last year and shows no sign of leveling off, a situation with which he would seem to be uniquely prepared to deal, having visited the scene of more than 2,000 murders in the city since he joined the force back in 1942.

After 30 years of viewing assorted types of carnage — shootings, stranglings, manglings, poisonings—Seedman tends to regard bodies simply as questions. As he looks down at a victim, as he did that morning in Central Park, it is almost possible to hear him riffling through his mental catalogue of violence, trying to determine where this body fits in: What was a girl like her doing with a guy like that? The same riffling process was repeated a few weeks later while everybody else commiserated with a widow weeping copiously over the centers. And it is a powerful argument.

An alternative to day-care centers

FOR any child, the years from birth to 6 are critical for his physical, intellectual and psychological development. Yet traditionally in the United States, the Government takes no official interest in a child between his arrival, when a birth certificate is required, until he is 6 years old, when the compulsory school attendance law takes effect. The assumption has been that families took care of these early childhood years. Yet the evidence is all around us that for some children, the family system has completely broken down and is not doing the necessary job of nurturing their characters, and preparing them for life. For other children, the family is still a viable emotional unit providing some strengths, but the fathers and mothers are so overwhelmed by adverse circumstances — sickness, ignorance, mental illness, inability to hold a steady job, or inability to cope with competitive, sophisticated city life — that those families need help in preparing their young children for school and later life. Still other children have competent parents who can cope with life in adult terms but who—out of ignorance, or irresponsibility, or selfishness — are not giving priority to their duties as parents; these children also need help.

Society can ignore the needs of the children in these various unfortunate circumstances but it cannot ignore them indefinitely or without cost. Sooner or later, a sizable number of them are going to show up as juvenile delinquents, as mentally retarded children, as emotionally disturbed patients in institutions, as adolescent drug addicts. Some may survive the school years but show up in prisons as young adult criminals, or in hospitals as mentally ill, or on the welfare rolls as unemployables. One or two may even show up on television screens as a Presidential assassin.

(Why all deprived, damaged children do not come to a dismal end, why some actually develop from this adversity a thriving will to succeed, is a blessing and a mystery. But one can speculate that behind each hard-hit child who later makes it in life there is someone—an older brother or sister, a devoted grandmother, a minister, a teacher, an athletic coach—who cared a lot and provided the youngster with a model and with guidance.)

THE Mondale bill which President Nixon vetoed is based on the theory that a big investment of money and effort in children, especially in the years from birth to 6, would save some of them from disasters later on and might actually reduce the amount of money that society now has to spend on juvenile-delinquent centers, prisons, mental hospitals, and other kinds of human repair and rehabilitation. In asserting the Government's comprehensive interest in these formative early years, the bill has many precedents, such as the long campaign against child labor, the public health effort to cut down infant mortality, the White House conferences on children and youth held once a decade since 1909, and the widely popular Head Start program enacted as a part of the poverty program.

Building on the Head Start model, the bill would go far beyond merely providing a convenient place near home or work where an employed mother could leave a child. It would establish child-development centers in every community. A child could get one, two or more meals, depending upon how many hours he stayed each day. A center would contract with outside doctors or clinics to provide medical, dental and psychiatric diagnosis and care. It would begin the education of preschool children and make available to them, as well as to older children, "summer, weekend, vacation and overnight programs." Parents would serve on the board of the center, and, if unemployed, they might be enlisted as volunteer workers or paid employes. In some circumstances, a mother might be paid to care for four or five children—her own as well as others—in her own home. This is called "family day care." Where needed, a professional or a trained volunteer would be sent out from the center to instruct and assist uneducated, inexperienced or underconfident mothers in baby and child care.

In short, this comprehensive approach is intended to be an active, responsible partner to every mother and, if a mother is absent, ill or indifferent, to serve as the best possible substitute. An ambitious concept realized in only a comparatively few existing centers, it signifies much more than the less expensive and more common day-care centers where children are, in effect, only in protective custody. "Custodial" child care is a dirty word among the experts in this field.

THE Mondale bill covers all children from birth through 14. There is comparatively little controversy, however, about the older children in the 6-to-14 age group who attend school. For them, the problem is primarily to find a place where they can play or otherwise usefully occupy themselves for two or three hours after school until their parents pick them up.

The conflict over comprehensive child-development programs concerns the 22 million children under the age of 6. In theory, the bill would permit a rich woman—Mrs. Nelson Rockefeller or Mrs. Robert Kennedy—to send her child to a development center if she wanted to pay the fee. But, as a practical matter, the bill is primarily intended to help the children of working mothers and those in poverty families. About seven million children in the under-6 age group have mothers who work. (The number of mothers in the work force has doubled since 1950, and the trend seems to be steadily upward.) About four million children live in families which are in dire poverty and about an equal number in families which are above the poverty line but still in straitened circumstances.

Poverty children are not identical with the children of working mothers, although the two groups overlap. In fact, proportionately more mothers work in families with annual incomes above $10,000 than in families with incomes below $3,000. This paradox is understandable because more middle-class women have marketable skills and have the money to pay for maids, babysitters, private nursery schools and other forms of child care. But some of the confusion that surrounds the child-development issue is caused by the fact that mothers in quite different circumstances — the highly paid advertising woman who lives in Scarsdale, the factory worker's wife trying to eke out her budget in Queens, the 17-year-old unwed mother just arrived in Bedford-Stuyvesant from a farm in South Carolina—are lumped together for purposes of discussion, and arguments which would be applicable to the family circumstances of one woman are used to justify or attack programs to help women in entirely different circumstances.

Although children from every kind of family could conceivably participate, the real emotional force behind the drive for comprehensive child development is the desire of liberal, compassionate people to improve the chances in life of children from the nation's worst-off families — migrant laborers and sharecroppers, unemployed miners in Appalachia, impoverished Mexicans, Puerto Ricans, Indians and blacks. Two-thirds of the places in the child-development centers would be reserved for the children of these low-income families.

In testimony before a Senate subcommittee, John Niemeyer, president of the Bank Street College of Education in New York City, graphically described the plight of families trapped in a city slum. "These families needed all kinds of help," Niemeyer reported. "Typically there was a mother with four or five children, a father not in the picture regularly — although that is not true in all of the cases—and the needs run in this order, as far as we could ascertain them:

"First of all, these adults are physically ill. Secondly, they live in constant physical fear—and very real fear. Fear of the pusher, fear of the person breaking in and stealing everything out of your meager little apartment, fear of the children getting run over in the heavy traffic in the streets....

"And then the third great need, particularly on the part of mothers, is help with loneliness, with a tremendous feeling of vacancy in their lives. In fact, I am inclined to believe one of the problems that surrounds the whole question of... birth control, and so on, with people of this kind, is the problem of loneliness. Because I feel that many of these mothers, [when they have a baby] for two or three years have something to love and to fondle, and so on. I really think this fills a void in their lives, and I don't think that a knowledge of birth control will make a significant difference as long as we have these particular human emotional needs....

"Now this seems almost unbelievable, but I think that it is easy for us to put ourselves into the position of a person like this, women who spend all day in bed because there is nothing in the home except a television. And the television, of course, has been the great pacifier and mesmerizer of children because almost the minute they can see, they are propped up to watch this image that is flickering there — it's almost, I think, like hypnotism."

In what is rather an understatement, Niemeyer concluded: "These are the parents and families for which intervention is necessary."

Not all welfare mothers and their children are in the desperate circumstances described by Niemeyer. Some have personal strengths. But the apathy, physical squalor and fear are brutal realities. So are the low-grade infections and correctible physical defects which sap their energies. The question is what the state can effectively do to help. In an interview, Senator Mondale told me:

"In the last several years of traveling around the country and holding hearings on different aspects of the poverty problem, I examined all the different approaches — manpower training, enriched education, rehousing, and so on—and I kept coming back to the view that we have to reach these children in their first five years and do everything we can to improve their chances in life. For most of us, this is a great, rich, wonderful society full of hope and opportunity. But some people are outside the mainstream of American life. Are we content to say that hundreds of thousands of children because they were cheated at birth and in their early years are to be condemned to lives of failure and frustration?

"Consider a child, white or black or brown, who grows up in a community where he doesn't have enough to eat, lives in squalid, unsanitary housing, grows up without books or any kind of help, grows up in a broken home, grows up amid a depressed environment, without any health care, and then goes to what is often the worst school in town. The reactionaries of this country are trying to describe efforts to help that child as welfare, which is the code word by which we deliver money from 'decent, hard-working Americans' to this child and others like him, when in fact the issue is justice, permitting children to have the same chance in American society."

If a desire to improve the lot of impoverished children is one force behind proposals for comprehensive child development, the program's political appeal is enhanced by the benefits it offers three other groups of families: There are the families in modest economic circumstances with husbands who work but barely earn a subsistence income and wives who work part-time or full-time to pay for a few comforts beyond the family's necessities; these are the "working poor." A second group consists of middle-class women who ordinarily would not have to work when their children are small but who are driven back into the job market prematurely because of divorce, or the death or illness of their husbands. Third, there are the families in which husbands earn a satisfactory income but the women work by choice. These middle-class wives often argue for day care in terms of women's "liberation."

A fourth category might be families in which the husbands earn adequate incomes and wives do not pursue careers, but might do so if high-quality day care were available. In other words, comprehensive day care is not only a response to the increasing number of working mothers but its existence would probably serve to accelerate that trend.

Since the working poor, the widowed or divorced heads of middle-class families, and the "liberated" career women comprise a huge number of people, it is not astonishing that politicians in both parties climbed aboard the comprehensive child-development bandwagon. The bill passed the Senate, 63 to 17. Yet it is the inclusion of these other categories of people that also triggers the opposition. Their coverage makes it unmistakably clear that the Government is not setting out to cope with a limited and—if all goes well—diminishing number of impoverished children. Rather, it is embarking upon a program which could cover virtually all children and would not only recognize but confirm a profound change in the way in which Americans rear their children.

The opposition in and out of Congress has formed on both economic and cultural grounds. In the original version of his bill, Mondale proposed spending $2-billion in the first year of operation, $4-billion in the second and $7-billion in the third. These subsequent authorizations were dropped from the modified version that passed the Senate, and news stories usually referred to the bill as having "a $2-billion price tag." Once the program was fully under way, however, even if all eligible children did not participate and many of those who did were charged modest fees, the annual cost would be in the range of $20-billion to $30-billion a year. The cost of quality care for children in which food, toys, equipment and medical care are provided is at least $2,000 a year for each child. Dr. Jerome Kagan, chairman of the White House Conference's panel on day care, offered these rough estimates in Senate testimony:

"As you might expect, private centers run more efficiently than public centers. My impression is that, if you are working with preschool children 2½ to 5 years of age, $45 a week [per child] will run a pretty good private center. A public center which has more bureaucracy will probably be given $55 or $60 a week. You have to add 10 to 20 per cent for infants. It is more expensive to have a center for the first two years of life.... If this becomes a popular and approved way of raising American children, one could have half the population of children aged 0 to 6 requesting day care. You could spend all the money you want: 13 million children at $60 a week, which is $3,000 a child a year. If you pause to multiply those figures you have an enormous amount of money—$39-billion."

As it developed, President Nixon vetoed the bill for broad reasons having little to do with fee schedules or financial cost. The cost is probably not a decisive consideration for those on either side of the argument.

It gives hostile critics a handle with which to attack the bill, but most conservatives, when candid, admit that they would not like the program even if it cost only half as much. Liberals meanwhile dismiss the financial argument with the assertion that if this country can afford to subsidize aerospace companies and build a space shuttle, it can afford to invest huge sums in its own children.

More fundamental to the debate is the philosophy underlying the bill, which President Nixon attacked head-on, thereby evoking the angriest response from the bill's advocates. Liberals were quick to point out that his veto was a sop to the right wing of the President's party and that the Presidential candidacy of Representative John Ashbrook, a convinced conservative ideologue, may have had more than a little to do with Mr. Nixon's decision.

Most conservatives in Congress bitterly oppose President Nixon's Family Assistance Plan, better known as "welfare reform," a creditable if modest attempt to introduce the principle of a minimum income for every family. In opposing the Comprehensive Child-Development Bill, they argue in much the same way as they do against President Nixon's Family Assistance Plan. Unstated but clearly visible is their conviction that a guaranteed minimum income for poor families would merely encourage them to have more babies. Their second conviction is that the poor are financial failures solely because of moral turpitude or personal weakness. If they are poor, they deserve to suffer the consequences. (This is the converse of the sentimental liberal view that the poor cannot be held morally accountable to any degree for their behavior and that society is to blame for everything.) Rejecting the evidence of new psychology and old common sense, conservatives insist upon applying a rationalistic carrot-and-stick economic theory as if welfare mothers were so many calculating Benthamites. If only the right economic pressures can be found, these conservatives believe, welfare mothers can be squeezed off welfare and onto private payrolls—as if a woman's employability in the market place were the highest test of her moral worth or her usefulness to society.

In trying to sell the Family Assistance Plan, Mr. Nixon has pandered to these conservative prejudices—and involved himself in a glaring contradiction. Thus, his welfare bill would provide $750-million annually to pay for day-care centers for the children of welfare mothers, so that these women can be trained and can work. It would apply initially to women with children over 6 and, after a short time, to those with children over 3. But in vetoing the Mondale child-development bill last December, Mr. Nixon piously warned against committing "the vast moral authority of the national Government to the side of communal approaches to child rearing over against the family-centered approach." Why is it right to coerce welfare mothers to put their children in Government-financed day-care centers in order to go to work and wrong to assist other women who voluntarily want to do the same thing?

Liberals and radicals, on the other hand, argue vigorously in behalf of comprehensive child-development centers for reasons which have only indirectly, if at all, to do with children and the family. They want child-care centers to energize the parents and get them involved in the community. Mrs. Maurien McKinley, associate director of the Black Child Development Institute in Washington, expressed a view put forward by numerous witnesses: "We believe that child-development centers can be the catalyst for total community development. It is to the advantage of the entire nation to view the provision of day-care/child-development services within the context of the need for a readjustment of societal power relationships. . . . As day-care centers are utilized to catalyze development in black and other communities, the enhanced political and economic power that results can provide effective leverage for the improvement of the over-all social and economic condition of the nation."

Translated from sociological jargon, this is the community-action theory which underlies the poverty program and the Model Cities program. It is the theory that only if the poor are organized and power taken away from "the Establishment" is progress possible. All the establishments—the politicians, the schoolteachers, the social workers, the doctors and medical administrators—are regarded as more harmful than helpful to the poor because of their heavy-handed paternalism. Without getting into the pros and cons of this complicated argument, one can see that the theory of community action has more to do with helping adults to fight City Hall than with helping fathers and mothers to rear their children.

POLITICS aside, however, President Nixon's argument against actively encouraging the shift from the family to the day-care center as the prime agent in child-rearing goes to the heart of the issue. Are child-development centers desirable for any children other than the most damaged and deprived? The unpopular truth is that any community facility—call it a day-care center or a child-development center—is at best an inadequate, unsatisfactory substitute, and at worst a dangerous, destructive substitute for a child's own mother.

In the months of infancy, a child's whole universe consists of himself and the person who feeds him, dresses him and responds to his cries and other signals for attention. Although the development of a human being is imperfectly understood since babies cannot talk, intensive research by Dr. Margaret Mahler and other experts on what psychiatrists call the "separation-individuation process" shows that in the period from approximately 6 months of age to 2 years, critically important events are taking place in the formation of a child's personality. During those months, he learns that his mother is not just an extension of himself, that he is a person in his own right, that his mother can leave him and that there are other persons in the world besides himself and her.

Superficially, it is true that anybody can feed a baby or change his diapers. But in the most profound emotional sense, a baby's whole sense of himself depends upon the warmth and consistency of the relationship that he has with the person who takes care of him. If he is indifferently or inconsistently treated by a succession of various adults—as he would tend to be if left in a day-care center for 8 or 10 hours a day—he is truly a deprived child. Psychological research indicates that anxieties, depression, passivity and other serious handicaps may develop. From 2 to 3 years of age, a toddler learning to talk and to run about can begin to stutter or suffer other impairments, from slight to serious, if he is subjected to severe emotional upheaval—such as a shift from family care to day care. In the years from 3 to 6, other important though less dramatic stages of development unfold in the child's life. For these reasons, most well-run nursery schools which serve middle-class and upper-class families rarely take children before they are 2½ or 3 years old, and do not keep them more than three or four hours a day until they are at least 5 years old.

Day-care centers have become important institutions in this country in recent years as the number of working mothers has increased, but other nations have had much longer and more extensive experience with them. Dr. Dale Meers, a Washington psychiatrist, has reported on a study of programs in the Soviet Union, Hungary, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Israel and France. The report, published by the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity and entitled, "International Day Care: A Selective Review and Psychoanalytic Critique," is hardly an encouraging document. In the Soviet Union, Dr. Meers reports, senior officials who run the day-care centers do not make use of them for their own children. "Their preference [is] to use their incomes to employ someone to care for their children at home." Dr. Meers found that Hungarian officials hoped eventually to eliminate day care for children under 3 because of the "manifest unhappiness" of the child. In Czechoslovakia, the best day care "appeared hygienic, sterile and depressing." In every country, Communist and non-Communist alike, officials encountered serious problems of staffing and rapid turnover.

"Nursing staff covertly resist continuity of care of one or more babies. Indeed, it was a common experience, internationally, that care-givers often could not readily identify their children by name and, with babies, did not know with certitude whether each one had been fed. . . . The younger and less active the child in the day nursery, the smaller the amount of attention he received.

"Multiple mothering all too frequently provides an uncoordinated octopus. The multiplicity of care-givers, their overlapping of shifts, their replaceability for illness or holidays, their departures for other employment, all leave the very young child accommodating first to one and then to another."

The enthusiasts of day care more often point to Israel where many children are communally reared in the kibbutz. But more sophisticated advocates agree that Americans have a tendency to idealize the Israeli situation. "One must draw on one's own cultural tradition, one's own identities," for the institutions that will solve the problems, Dr. Urie Bronfenbrenner of Cornell University observed to the Mondale subcommittee. Israel is a small, beleaguered nation with the uniquely high morale of a people who feel themselves under siege and fighting for their very existence. No comparable sense of common danger and common destiny informs communal life in the United States, a vast, rich, diverse and relatively sheltered country. A kibbutz, moreover, is a small, agricultural community where the parents work in the fields close by the "children's house" and are available to their children for three or four hours a day in the late afternoon and early evening.

Israeli practices in communal child rearing are the subject of intense controversy both within Israel and among outside experts. The evidence is not all in because really thorough scientific studies are only now being conducted, but there is some indication, as Dr. Bruno Bettelheim reported in his book, "The Children of the Dream," that kibbutz-raised children show significant personality differences from children raised in the conventional family. For example, the kibbutz children get along well with their peers and are very loyal to their group, but often seem incapable of deep emotional attachments and creative intensity.

In short, the experience of other countries with state-provided communal child care on a large scale does not suggest that this is a course on which the United States should enthusiastically embark. The risks for many, though not all, children range from mild neuroses and developmental lags to serious maladjustments.

Nor does the evidence cited in the Mondale Subcommittee's own hearings support the exaggerated claims made for parental involvement and control. The A.F.L.-C.I.O., a principal supporter of the bill, submitted a lengthy, glowing report on a day-care center operated in Chicago by the Amalgamated Clothing Workers Union for its own members. The report states: "Because the parents work, they are not free to come into the center during the day to investigate its benefits; after work, they are tired, with little interest in coming to evening parents' meetings. Therefore, education of the parents with regard to center capabilities is a slow process. There has been only one parents' meeting held, on a Sunday. Attendance was 50 per cent. The parents do bring the children in the morning and pick them up at night, so there is a brief opportunity to see what the children are doing and to visit with the staff."

That is the actual degree of parent participation in a center which the AFL-CIO describes as "a Rolls-Royce of day care."

THERE is a radical alternative to child-care centers which I believe would avoid the staffing difficulties, the psychic risks and the other drawbacks of communal care: Pay mothers to take care of their own children in their own homes.

Many years ago, Dr. Benjamin Spock put forward the ideal solution in his characteristically simple, straightforward language. In "Baby and Child Care," he wrote: "Some mothers have to work to make a living. Usually their children turn out all right because some reasonably good arrangement is made for their care. But others grow up neglected and maladjusted. It would save money in the end if the Government paid a comfortable allowance to all mothers of young children who would otherwise be compelled to work. . . . It doesn't make sense to let mothers go to work making dresses in a factory or tapping typewriters in an office, and have them pay other people to do a poorer job of bringing up their children."

A comparison of costs suggests that the Federal Government, if it chooses to do so, can as easily pay a mother to take care of her own children as to finance them in a day-care facility. Most working mothers, unless they have high professional qualifications, would consider themselves fortunate if they found work paying $150 a week ($7,800 a year). After deductions for Federal and state income taxes, Social Security, union dues, lunches and carfare, their take-home pay would be about $100 a week, or $5,200 a year. To provide the kind of comprehensive child care which the Mondale bill envisages could easily cost $2,600 a year a child. If that sum were paid directly to the mother of two children, she would have as much income as if she went out to work.

Such an approach would not solve all the problems of all the broken and overwhelmed families at the bottom of the heap. They and their children would still need the kind of direct help that social workers have long tried to provide. But the direct approach would meet the needs of the millions of children of the working poor and of those middle-class single parents — widows, widowers and divorcées — who are perfectly capable of coping with life and taking care of their own children if only they had more money. The financially well-off mothers who work only for their own satisfaction would not benefit, because any family allowance they received could be largely offset by higher taxes.

TRUE equality between the sexes is wholly desirable, but the liberation of women must not become a potential defeat for young preschool children. Women should not try to combine a full-time job with raising small children. It is a rare and exceptionally gifted woman who does something more important in the outside world than she does during those critical first six years when she is helping to form the personality and character of a child.

Essentially, it is a matter of making a rational choice. If a young woman decided to join the Peace Corps, she would know that she was signing up for two years of her life. If she decided to go to medical school, she would know that she was committing herself to four years of hard work. I suggest that if a woman decides to have a baby, she should know that she is signing up for six years before she can return to work full time.

The direct, simple method of paying parents to stay at home with their children is perhaps utopian, basically because Americans do not believe in the family as much as they think they do. No one can say when or if Americans will reinvigorate those values which make parenthood the most serious human vocation, which are essential to sustain happy, effective families and which, if practiced, would truly make this country what it now mistakenly thinks it is —a child-centered society. ■

Senate Unit Puts Stiff Work Rule In Welfare Bill

Families Without Pre-School Children Would Get Jobs But Couldn't Get Payments

Richardson, Hodgson Critical

5/1/72

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — Congress is heading into an election-year clash over welfare reform, with liberals and conservatives pushing in different directions on President Nixon's proposed family assistance plan.

The outline of the struggle became clearer Friday as the Senate Finance Committee voted 10 to four to substitute for a large part of the Nixon plan a harsher program prohibiting welfare payments to families without pre-school children.

Under the Finance Committee plan, which is likely to gather conservative support on the Senate floor, a mother or father would be guaranteed a government job at $1.20 an hour and would be eligible for a job in private industry at $1.60 an hour, partly subsidized by the government.

Committee Chairman Russell Long (D., La.) said the plan would apply to about 1.2 million welfare recipients, or 40% of those receiving benefits under the current program of aid to families with dependent children. The committee still must decide what to do about the other 60% in that program.

Shortly after the committee's action was announced, Health, Education and Welfare Secretary Elliot Richardson and Labor Secretary James Hodgson attacked it as "a $9 billion step backward . . . into the leaf-raking schemes of the 1930s."

Mr. Nixon's plan, which is generally embodied in a measure that passed the House last year, would establish a federal minimum welfare payment of $2,400 a year for a family of four. Senate liberals will try to raise that figure when the bill comes to the Senate floor, probably late this month.

The Finance Committee bill would set up a federal employment corporation, which would try to place welfare registrants in private jobs. If such jobs weren't available, these persons would become employes of the corporation, doing "make-work" jobs at $1.20 an hour.

Here's What's Happening with FAP

The Senate Finance Committee is in the process of throwing out the FAP (Title IV) provisions of H. R. 1 and substituting Russell Long's "Guaranteed Employment Program". (See summary below). This means that when the Senate Finance Committee reports H. R. 1 to the entire Senate it will not contain FAP but it will be worse than FAP.

Once the Senate begins to consider H. R. 1 (about June 1st) it is expected that Senator Ribicoff will make a motion to substitute his amendments for the Long version of Title IV. His motion will get 20-35 votes and will fail. A similar motion, this time substituting FAP for Long's Title is expected next. NWRO will oppose both motions.

NWRO's strategy is to oppose FAP and any amendments to FAP. If real welfare reform (such as the NWRO/McGovern $6500 Bill) is ever to be considered, FAP must be defeated now. NWRO will support any move which will aid in defeating FAP. We will welcome confusion and delay. The longer it takes the Senate to work on it, the more likely the chances that FAP will not be voted on. The Congress will recess from about July 1st to the middle of July for the Democratic Convention. If FAP isn't considered prior to July 1, the chances are good it won't be considered at all.

URGE YOUR SENATORS AND SUPPORTERS TO WORK FOR THE DEFEAT OF FAP (TITLE IV OF H. R. 1) AND THE DEFEAT OF RUSSELL LONG'S ALTERNATIVE PROPOSAL.

Summary of Russell Long's "Guaranteed Employment Program"

The Senate Finance Committee has adopted this plan instead of FAP and will report it to the Senate. It is still unknown what the whole plan will be. This summarizes only the work provisions which are the only part they have completed.

1. Welfare will be eliminated for most families. Only families with children under six will be eligible for welfare. Families with an able-bodied adult and without children under six will not be eligible for welfare.

2. A massive employment program would be set up for family heads. The idea is to put family heads to work in one of three categories of jobs. Only one member of the family would be eligible. This would be the father unless he is dead, absent or incapacitated.

3. There will be three categories of jobs in the employment program. All have a 40 hour per week maximum.

A. Private or public employment at below the minimum wage. Included in this program are governmental payments designed to allow big companies to hire people at slave labor rates with the government making a payment to the employee equal to 3/4 of the difference between the wage and the minimum wage. For example, if the wage is $1.00 an hour the worker will receive a grant equal to 3/4 of 60¢ or 45¢ an hour for each hour worked.

B. Private Sector or Public employment which pays wages at or above the minimum wage.

C. Federal Public Services jobs for those unable to find jobs in categories A and B. Those jobs will pay $1.20 per hour.

4. Participants in the employment program will not be eligible for food stamps.

5. A person may choose to receive training under the WIN program but will receive only $1.00 per hour plus a 10¢ per hour bonus at the conclusion of training not to exceed one year.

6. A special payment equal to 10% of the wages covered by social security taxes will be paid to families whose head is working in either category A or B jobs. There is a $400 maximum on this payment and when a family's income reaches $4,000.00 the payment will equal $400 minus 1/4 of the amount by which the income exceeds $4,000.00. For example, if the family income rises to $5,000.00, the payment will equal $400 - (1/4 of $1,000.00) or $400.00 - $250.00 or $150.00. This payment will require separate application to I. R. S. and will be paid quarterly.

7. Families who have 5 or more members by June 30, 1973 will be eligible for a children's allowance of $25.00 a month for the 5th member, $15.00 for the 6th member and $10.00 for each additional member provided the family head is working substantially full time. If the head works less , the allowance will be reduced accordingly. The Children's Allowance will be payable in full until a family's income reaches $300 a month at which point the allowance will decrease $1 for each $2 of earned income above $300.

8. The administration of Federal Public Service jobs will fall to a new agency The Federal Employment Corporation (FEC). The FEC will pay the Children's Allowance and provide the Public Service job opportunities. I. R. S. will administer the 10% payment bonus.

Local Employment Services will be responsible for placing workers in category A and B jobs. The employment services will administer the subsidy payments for persons working in jobs not covered by the minimum wage.

WELFARE REFORM

SMALLER WELFARE PAYMENTS for needy children than for blind or aged were approved. W-S-J 5/31/72

Texas, as do 25 other states, sets a ceiling on all welfare payments and goes on from there to make bigger cuts in the needy-child category than in the others. Supreme Court Justice William H. Rehnquist writing a 6-3 decision, upheld the Texas system, saying it didn't violate the equal-protection clause of the 14th Amendment. "It isn't irrational for the state to believe that the young are more adaptable than the sick and elderly," he added. In the same ruling, but by a 5-4 vote, the high court approved the method used by 18 states to subtract all outside income earned by needy families.

Rehnquist said there wasn't any indication of racial discrimination in the Texas welfare payments system, even though 87% of the children involved are black or Mexican-American.

A loyalty oath for school teachers was upheld by the Supreme Court. It rejected the claims of a discharged teacher that the New York statute infringes on religious beliefs of Quakers. The justices also dismissed challenges to taxes imposed by Pennsylvania and Philadelphia on the wages of New Jersey residents. And they left untouched the California Supreme Court's action abolishing the death penalty in that state.

OBSTACLES GROW for welfare reform. Its chances look dimmer than earlier this year.

Backers see need for Senate compromise between Nixon's plan and Ribicoff's more liberal proposal; a modest boost in the basic $2,400-a-year benefit might win enough liberal votes. HEW planners quietly plot details. But Nixon might reject any compromise as too expensive, repugnant to his conservative supporters. W-S-J 6/12/72

Time may work against the President's plan. Finance Chairman Long won't bring a bill to the floor until June; as convention-time nears, more Democrats might turn against Nixon. The attached higher-Social-Security bait may be lost meantime. It might be split off from the welfare bill by July 1, so the fatter checks could go out before election.

Reports persist that Nixon might prefer to have the campaign issue of congressional inaction on welfare—rather than a reform law.

Welfare Report/Nixon, Congress decline to check soaring social services costs

Congress and President Nixon have made independent policy decisions not to bring the HEW Department's open-ended social services program under fiscal control until after the November elections.

The judgments were rendered on separate policy issues, but their combined impact will allow states to continue to tap the program, which, if left unchecked, could triple in size to $4.7 billion by the end of fiscal 1973.

Congress, for its part, rejected the imposition of a ceiling on the social service program's open-ended appropriation. The issue was considered July 25 in a House-Senate conference on the HEW appropriations bill (HR 15417).

The Senate Appropriations Committee had imposed a ceiling of $2.5 billion on the program, and the Senate rejected an amendment to remove it by a 39-52 vote on the floor. But House conferees, led by Appropriations Committee chairman George H. Mahon, D-Tex., objected strenuously and prevailed in conference.

Congressional rejection of the ceiling is a tribute to the effectiveness of Governors, state welfare directors and county officials who stormed Capitol Hill to lobby against the ceiling.

These forces besieged the conferees, urging rejection of the ceiling and arguing that the action would be wholly inequitable to states that were late-bloomers in the race for the federal social service dollar.

The only potential counterforce was the Administration, which has sought for three years to clamp a lid on the open-ended appropriation. But the Administration chose to lie low.

"The (HEW) Secretary was silent; the White House was silent," said Harley M. Dirks, a professional staff member of the Senate Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor-HEW. "Where were they when we needed them? And now the President wants to impose a $250-billion ceiling."

Presidential decision: The Administration's failure to lobby for a ceiling resulted from a view that Mr. Nixon expressed in late June on the shape of new regulations HEW was developing for its social services program.

The President directed HEW to prepare new regulations that would require states to develop better methods of accounting for their social service expenditures, but would not significantly obstruct the states' access to the program's open-ended largesse.

That Mr. Nixon made a personal judgment on a regulation for an HEW program reflects the political importance the White House has attached to social services.

The President arrived at his decision after HEW Secretary Elliot L. Richardson sent him a memorandum June 23 which outlined four possible options that the Administration could pursue in seeking better control of the program. The President selected by far the most expensive option, one that would delight Governors whose states were in financial distress, but also would result in a costly budget overrun.

In explaining this option, Richardson told the President:

"The obvious advantage to this approach is that we would not prevent states from continuing to exploit this source of fiscal relief. We would thus avoid a major political controversy.

"The equally obvious disadvantage is the price tag that we would have to pay for this approach: At least $2.7 billion above our FY 1973 budget and a program level of $6 billion or perhaps more in FY 1974.

"An additional disadvantage is that we cannot describe or account programmatically for these enormous sums. In fact, we may be helping, through our refinancing, to perpetuate some poor programs."

By selecting this approach, Mr. Nixon has avoided, for the time being, a major confrontation with the Governors, who have come to view the social services program as important a source of new federal funds as revenue sharing.

Program: HEW's social services program operates under the legal authority of the Social Security Act (49 Stat 620) and finances a wide range of services on a ratio of 75-per cent federal funds to 25-per cent state.

The services are rendered to former, current and potential welfare recipients and include child care, protective services for children and aged individuals in danger of abuse or neglect, mental health services, and alcoholic and drug abuse prevention.

HEW estimates that in fiscal 1972, 664,600 adults and 12 million children will receive social services financed principally by the department.

Although the states find somewhat attractive the prospect of increasing services to the welfare population, their chief interest in the program is that it is a major source of fiscal relief.

California and Illinois were the first to recognize the program's potential for easing their financial problems. Recently, most of the other states have awakened to the program's seemingly limitless money supply.

Now, a great race is under way by late-starting states to make the necessary changes in their social service programs that will enable them to share the wealth.

Two extreme examples of states that are seeking new service dollars are Maryland and Mississippi. In fiscal 1973, Mississippi estimates that the federal share of its service expenditures will be $14.2 million. The state is seeking changes in its social service plan that would raise the federal commitment to $463.6 million in fiscal 1974.

Maryland estimates that the federal share of its fiscal 1973 social service expenditures will total $21.8 million. Maryland has estimated the federal share in fiscal 1974 at $417.7 million, if HEW approves its proposed state-plan amendments.

Regulations and timing

The debate over the content of any new social service regulations raged so heatedly within the executive branch and became so important in terms of federal dollars that the Office of Management and Budget turned to the President for a decision.

Now that Mr. Nixon has decided upon the course of action, the question of when to promulgate new service regulations has become almost as big an issue as the substance.

Richardson sent to the President a nine-page memorandum listing the four possible options the Administration could follow, but did not offer a recommendation. The Secretary warned: "Unless we take decisive administrative action, the budget for social services threatens to exceed $4 billion in fiscal 1973; $2.7 billion over your budget request."

The Secretary characterized the social services phenomenon as "a virtual open-ended raid on the federal treasury," but added: "To control these costs is politically hazardous. Several states, such as New York, Illinois, New Jersey, Texas and Pennsylvania, have refinanced state programs to their advantage. They can be expected to resist any effort to curtail federal expenditures."

Alternatives: Richardson outlined four possible courses of action, three of which would have significantly curtailed social service program expenditures; a fourth called for states to improve their accounting procedures. Mr. Nixon selected this option.

Preferred option—Under this alternative, HEW would issue regulations requiring states to develop a planning and accounting system that would provide detail on how they use the federal social service dollars.

This approach was developed by HEW's Social and Rehabilitation Service, the agency under which social services is administered. As developed by social service program personnel, the proposal has been viewed generally as one that would prod states into developing better management structures to administer services, but not result in the loss of many federal dollars.

Other options—Richardson also raised the prospect of issuing regulations that would include a so-called "expansion-of-effort" restriction. Under such a requirement, federal social service funds would be available for matching only in relation to higher state expenditures. Such a structure would significantly curtail the program's uncharted growth rate.

"This approach still leads to an unacceptable level of federal expenditures for future years," Richardson said. He estimated that the program would grow to $2.8 billion in fiscal 1973 and $3.1 billion in fiscal 1974.

The toughest option Richardson put before the President was a proposed regulation that included an expansion-of-effort rule plus a curtailment in scope of services already financed partly through federal funds.

Under this option, which is the route favored by HEW's budget office, federal funding would be withdrawn for all room-and-board costs in public institutions, all health, mental health and medical services.

Richardson said: "This approach will have significant effect on almost all states, and states such as New York, Illinois, Massachusetts and Texas, which have recently revised their programs and thereby eased their fiscal problems, will be particularly agitated."

The fourth option presented by Richardson called for a phased implementation of the Administration's strategy for controlling the services program. Although it was rejected by the President, top HEW officials said they believe that it is the approach that the Administration ultimately will take.

In short, the strategy goes like this: do nothing that will cause a furor among the states before the November election; then issue regulations that will sharply cut the growth rate of social services shortly after the election.

"This combination," Richardson said, "seeks a balance between budget savings and political reaction. However, it will still leave severe budgetary problems and will result in considerable political repercussions."

John D. Twiname

Timing: Although the Administration has decided what shape its new service regulations will take in the short term, the question of when they will be promulgated is one that the Office of Management and Budget has not finally resolved.

C. William Fischer, chief of OMB's human resources division, laid out the pro and con arguments in a memorandum to OMB Director Caspar W. Weinberger in late July.

Fischer made no recommendation to Weinberger on when the regulations should be issued, but he noted that HEW believes that any delay would be viewed as hypocritical by the states.

John D. Twiname, administrator of HEW's Social and Rehabilitation Service, feels most deeply among top department officials about the need to issue new service regulations now that would call for states to adopt better management procedures.

Twiname expressed his view to Fischer in a memo dated July 14. He said:

"The more I contemplate this issue, the more it appears to me that the Administration is taking a far greater risk to delay issuance of the regulations than otherwise . . . I think the most serious element . . . is its delay of the effort to establish controls of some sort in a program that appears to be running away with the federal dollar."

Congress

The Administration's indecision about when it should publish proposed social service regulations in the Federal Register is bound up in the OMB's hopes that Congress will take action to control the program.

Reflecting the decision Mr. Nixon made in declining to curb the program's growth before November, the OMB is hesitant to publish the regulations for fear of the political repercussions.

The OMB is hopeful that Congress will move up one of the available avenues to halt the open-ended assault on the social services account. There are several possibilities for action, but none looks very promising.

Although the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee have acted to impose a ceiling on the program, the attitude of most Members is best expressed by the action of the House-Senate conference on the Labor-HEW appropriations bill. The conference removed a ceiling from the program.

Conference: The tale of the conference is best told by looking at the Members who were in the best position to make the ceiling stick and chose otherwise.

House Appropriations Committee chairman Mahon, an acknowledged conservative with the federal dollar, went into the conference as an agressive advocate of removing the ceiling.

Although the conference had 77 differences before it to resolve, Mahon appeared to argue his position on behalf of only one: removal of the $2.5-billion social services ceiling imposed by the Senate.

Mahon was acting out of concern for Texas, which has only lately gotten on board with other states to tap the social services open-ended account in a significant way. A ceiling imposed now would hurt Texas and other states that are seeking new service dollars from HEW.

Texas Gov. Preston Smith, D, impressed on Mahon and Rep. Bob Casey, D-Tex., another House conferee, the absolute necessity of removing the Senate-imposed ceiling.

Smith did not limit his lobbying activities to Texas Democrats. Edwin F. Powers, an assistant to Smith, said: "Sen. (John G.) Tower (R-Tex.) has helped us clear up roadblocks in OMB. His influence has been helpful within the Administration."

Tower did not participate in the conference committee, but Powers said he had eased Texas' access to the first installment of new service dollars to the state.

Assuming other installments follow, Powers said, the federal share to finance services in Texas will increase from $15.2 million in fiscal 1972 to $178.6 million in fiscal 1973.

Flood's influence—Another member of the conference as important as Mahon in removing the services ceiling was Rep. Daniel J. Flood, D-Pa., chairman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor-HEW.

Flood has long been a champion of an open-ended services program and Pennsylvania has fared as well as most states in tapping the account. Flood argued in conference that it was the responsibility of the committees which authorize social security legislation—Senate Finance and House Ways and Means—to make any substantive changes in the services program.

One conference participant said privately: "Flood was so strong in favor of removing the ceiling that the other subcommittee members were virtually silent on the question, even those who favored a ceiling."

Senate effort—The Senate conferees went into the session July 25 holding the upper hand, at least on paper. The Senate, in rejecting a floor amendment, 39-52, to remove the ceiling, had provided its conferees with a strong bargaining point.

Sen. Norris Cotton of New Hampshire, the ranking Republican on the Labor-HEW appropriations subcommittee, used the argument in conference and also emphasized that he was not wedded to a ceiling of $2.5 billion; he just wanted a reasonable ceiling.

The conference zipped through all but one of the 77 items before it in one day and, in the view of several participants, the Senate conferees receded from their position on a ceiling because their House counterparts were so reasonable on most of the other issues.

Six-Fold Cost Increase in Three Years

The HEW Department's burgeoning social services program will have grown six-fold between fiscal 1971 and fiscal 1973, according to the latest state estimates. States now estimate that the federal share of their service expenditures in fiscal 1973 will total $4.7 billion. Listed below for each state are the federal share of social service costs in 1971, the May 1972 estimates of fiscal 1973 federal expenditures for social services as submitted to HEW by the states, and July 1972 estimates as provided by states at a meeting of Governors' representatives and state social service administrators in Washington on July 17. The figures are in millions and are rounded.

"A conciliatory climate prevailed in the conference," said one participant. "The House members were a pretty reasonable group on every item except social services. That had an effect on the attitude of the Senators."

The Senators accepted as a compromise solution to the issue language in the conference report (HRep 92-1280) which urges the Administration and Congress to work "with the states to devise effective means of exerting fiscal control over social services programs."

The conference report also directed HEW "to submit to both the House and Senate Appropriations Committees no later than the commencement of the second quarter of 1973 a comprehensive plan for a system of fiscal restraint and programmatic accountability in social services programs.

"Such a program is expected to include a system of allotments of social services funds among states with proper consideration to population, per capita income, welfare consolidation, and past experience in social services program delivery. It is anticipated that such a plan could become effective no later than Jan. 1, 1973."

Authorizing committees: With the imposition of an appropriations ceiling an impossibility, the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means committees have acted to control services through other legislation.

During its consideration of HR 1, the Administration's social security-welfare reform bill, the Senate Finance Committee approved on June 11 a ceiling of $1 billion on the services program and scaled down the federal matching requirement.

Last year, the House approved a ceiling of $800 million in HR 1, with the exception of child-care and family-planning services, which would continue to be funded on an open-ended basis. The Finance Committee treated these two services in a similar fashion.

Although both committees have approved ceilings, the bill which includes the stricture is in deep trouble because of its welfare reform provision.

With the chance of HR 1's passage growing dimmer every day, these committees will have to find another legislative vehicle to which to attach a services ceiling.

Revenue sharing: Sen. Russell B. Long, D-La., chairman of the Finance Committee, has expressed an interest in tying firmer federal control over services to the House-passed revenue-sharing bill (HR 14370) that his panel is considering. (For a report on the revenue-sharing bill, see Vol. 4, No. 32, p. 1245.)

George H. Mahon

Norris Cotton

Long opened a hearing July 20 that took testimony from a dozen Governors on the merits of revenue sharing by criticizing the spiraling cost of social services. "We cannot afford to continue the present social services system if we are going to provide $5.3 billion a year, and more, in revenue-sharing funds under the bill before us today," he said.

The committee approved Aug. 9, the day it completed action on its revenue-sharing bill, a provision that would sharply retrench the federal financial commitment to social services next year.

Under the provision, HEW could honor current services contracts for six months. But, after that, the department would finance only child-care and family-planning services on an open-ended basis.

HEW would distribute an additional $1 billion on a formula based on population. Large states that have done well in the services program would suffer under the provision and will presumably object to it.

Sen. Wallace F. Bennett, R-Utah, estimated that the provision "would save at least $3 billion" of the $4.7 billion the states estimate they will now spend for services in fiscal 1973.

Bennett said the provision will have "all-out Administration support." However, the President expressed Aug. 3 in a letter to Richardson his desire to keep the revenue-sharing bill free of "selected elements of HR 1."

The President said he would "strongly oppose" any move to amend HR 14370 "because it could doom the possibility of real welfare reform in this Congress and could seriously jeopardize the revenue-sharing bill."

Outlook

The prospect that Congress will impose a ceiling on HEW's social services program this session is not bright; states that are racing to fatten the federal commitment to their services program seemingly have a green light.

But it is unrealistic to expect that the Administration will adhere after November to the generous attitude it is now taking to the growth of the program.

Such a posture simply does not square with the President's announced intent to hold federal expenditures in fiscal 1973 close to $250 billion.

Mr. Nixon warned the Congress in a message July 26 that "no matter what the political pressures, no matter how frequently I may be told that in an election year a President cannot veto a spending measure," he will consider such action in bills that reach his desk that are too expensive.

The first real test of Mr. Nixon's intent, is likely to be the Labor-HEW appropriations bill which should clear Congress before it adjourns Aug. 18 for the Republican National Convention. As approved by the House-Senate Labor-HEW appropriations conference, the bill exceeds the President's fiscal 1973 request by $1.8 billion.

A veto, though, will have no effect on the social services program because of its open-ended appropriation. Therefore, unless the White House sharply changes its course, it will likely be early next year before any sharp curb is placed by the executive branch to slow the unconstrained growth of the social services program.

WELFARE: THE PROGRAM NOBODY WANTS

by Mitchell I. Ginsberg

Public welfare is a mess. This is probably the one statement about America's income-maintenance program on which almost everyone can agree, even many of the 15 million poor people who depend on welfare for survival.

As a major public issue, attacking welfare is a surefire winner for the press and politicians with nearly every audience. Always an issue, in recent years welfare has become a major one in most political campaigns. The public's concern mounted steadily as welfare recipients doubled and costs tripled during the past decade.

In response to this concern, President Nixon announced almost three years ago that welfare reform was his No. 1 domestic priority. Democratic presidential nominee George McGovern proposed a sweeping new approach, which he subsequently modified. Both programs came under heavy attack.

During the legislation's three-year journey, many individuals and groups have worked hard for constructive welfare reform; but nothing has happened or is likely to happen in the near future. Part of the reason for inaction is that welfare is so complicated that very few people understand it. What is more important is that people dislike it for very different reasons and thus want very different changes. The result is little agreement on what should be done.

Even those who are supposed to be experts in this area differ on solutions. Since objective research and evaluation are lacking, anyone can be an expert without being concerned with facts. Most citizens and taxpayers see welfare as a waste of their tax money and see the solution as cutting back and tightening up. Welfare recipients think it is already too strict and, above all, want the payments to be higher. Public officials see it as a huge drain on their budgets and a constant goad to charges of fraud and mismanagement. Welfare administrators and staff feel attacked from all sides and receive very little support from anybody.

In essence welfare is the one public program that has no political constituency, no political clout. Any other public program has support: the average citizen wants good schools because his children and grandchildren will probably use them. He wants a good police force, good fire protection, clean streets and quality medical care. He and his family have a vested interest in having good services available because they expect to need them. But the same citizen not only does not anticipate using welfare, but often feels contempt for those who do.

Welfare is not a new program in the United States, although in recent years it has expanded considerably. In the early colonial days most aid to the needy was given as charity by religious and civic groups. Soon states and local governments became involved, although help continued to be offered only in a limited and grudging fashion.

The great depression of the 1930s brought a major change. Millions of unemployed workers needed help: obviously it could no longer be said that poverty was all their own fault. Rugged individualism was clearly not enough and it was recognized that economic want was now a major problem requiring the participation of the national government. At the same time, there was also recognition of the need for a variety of social insurance programs. At the urging of President Roosevelt and with the support of organized labor and many other groups, Congress passed the historic Social Security Act of 1935. Along with old age and unemployment insurance, this act created a number of national welfare programs that continue today. The original programs were:

Old Age Assistance (OAA).

Aid to the Blind (AB).

Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC).

In 1950, another category was added: Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled, or APTD. States

SACRAMENTO—Joe Bayuga, a 28-year-old Mexican-American with a master's degree in Spanish, recently started counseling disadvantaged students for California State University at Chico. Earlier he had worked as a locksmith's apprentice in the campus key shop.

Instead of taking home a paycheck from either part-time job, he simply continued to receive his $240 monthly welfare check for himself and his family.

Joe Bayuga is one of 147 California welfare recipients whose pioneer role is to test Gov. Ronald Reagan's controversial "community work experience program." The program, known as CWEP, began in June as a federally funded demonstration project and a key element in Mr. Reagan's much-heralded "welfare-reform" plan.

In March 1971, when he first proposed CWEP and other welfare changes, Gov. Reagan said he hoped to slash $700 million annually from skyrocketing welfare spending in the state. Welfare officials say savings since March 1971 have totaled over $500 million in the state, federal and local funds that otherwise would have been spent if the Reagan programs hadn't been adopted. Meantime, since March of last year, 220,653 welfare clients have been dropped from the rolls, which hit a high of 2.3 million in the state that month.

Under CWEP, able-bodied welfare recipients like Mr. Bayuga who cannot be placed in permanent jobs or training must work for a government or nonprofit agency for up to 80 hours a month to be eligible for aid. If Mr. Bayuga had refused his initial assignment to the campus key shop or hadn't shown up for his present counseling job, his portion of his family's Aid for Dependent Children (AFDC) grant would have been cut off.

Instant Controversy

Although the program, dubbed "workfare," has only been operating in five California counties for four months, it already has generated controversy among welfare-rights groups, some program administrators and state legislators. (By next June, about 30,000 "employable" men and women receiving AFDC grants in 35 of the state's 58 counties are expected to be doing community-service work.)

The California Welfare Rights Organization, branding the work-or-no-welfare idea as "slavery" and a violation of federal welfare laws, twice won court-ordered delays of the program. The group's court action held up final approval of the $228,000 grant by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare for nearly a year.

But when the final go-ahead for CWEP came in June, the Reagan administration put a damper on further efforts to block the program by suing the welfare-rights group and asking a federal district court in Los Angeles to declare the project valid. (The case is expected to go to trial in mid-December.) A similar HEW-approved demonstration project for New York ground to a halt in early August after barely getting off the ground. New York's public-work relief program has been held up by a restraining order issued by a U.S. district court in New York; the court acted after the program had been challenged by the city of New York and the National Welfare Rights Organization.

There have been previous federal tryouts of the idea of making welfare clients work in exchange for their assistance; one less-than-successful attempt was known as community work in training. Implemented in about 10 states, it was abandoned by Congress in 1968 largely because it failed either to reduce welfare rolls and costs or to place many welfare recipients in permanent jobs, according to Leonard Goodwin, a social psychologist with the Brookings Institution. Yet the continuing intense national political interest in work-or-no-welfare efforts became apparent earlier this month when one of the three welfare-revision experiments approved by the Senate was a "workfare" plan to provide guaranteed, paid government jobs instead of welfare grants. (However, the compromise version of the welfare-Social Security bill passed by Congress Tuesday dropped the three planned experiments in welfare reform.)

The "Last Resort"

In California, the controversial CWEP is the "last-resort" part of Gov. Reagan's attempt to cut welfare rolls through a comprehensive by suing the welfare-rights group and asking a federal district court in Los Angeles to declare the project valid. (The case is expected to go to trial in mid-December.) (However, the compromise version of the welfare-Social Security bill passed by Congress Tuesday dropped the three planned experiments in welfare reform.)

The "Last Resort"

In California, the controversial CWEP is the "last-resort" part of Gov. Reagan's attempt to cut welfare rolls through a comprehensive employable program of counseling able-bodied welfare recipients through state employment offices. Since June, 2,018 recipients—mainly unemployed fathers and mothers with children over age six—have become the responsibility of state employment offices in the five CWEP counties. Of the 2,018, more than half have already been put into permanent jobs or work-training programs, state officials report.

However, because of the so-called Talmadge Amendment to the Social Security Act (named for Georgia Sen. Herman E. Talmadge), which took effect in late summer, employable welfare recipients all over the country must register and search for work or training through state employment agencies. The difference between the California and the federal efforts is CWEP —a mandatory service obligation for welfare clients who can't find work or training. For the 147 Californians assigned to community-work projects so far, these tasks have ranged from shoveling manure at the Chico campus farm to working as a translator-clerk in a state government office to shelving books as library aides.

According to proponents of the pilot project, CWEP enables men and women on welfare to perform services for their communities that might otherwise go undone for lack of funds. For instance, in Ventura County, near Los Angeles, most of the 89 persons assigned to CWEP are working for the county parks department. "They are weeding out areas that would otherwise be sitting there for a long period of time," says Paul Lamp, parks supervisor.

Supporters of CWEP also contend the public-service assignments build up work-experience records that may help welfare participants in landing a permanent job. In Butte County, 90 miles north of Sacramento, one participant has already obtained a job as a buildings and grounds maintenance man with a public agency where he had spent two weeks working off his monthly welfare grant. "So he will be discontinued from aid," says Jake Miller, CWEP supervisor for the southern half of Butte County.

In addition, through CWEP, women who have been unemployed mothers all their adult lives as well as unskilled, long-unemployed fathers are expected to acquire valuable work habits. "You're coming across people who are second- and third-generation welfare recipients, for whom the thought of working is just frightening," Thelma Bachand says. Mrs. Bachand runs the Chico Human Resources Development Office, the state employment agency that administers CWEP in northern Butte County.

But critics of CWEP dispute its potential benefits on several fronts. For one thing, even the least job-experienced welfare client knows how to get somewhere on time. So except for the reinforcement of these known work habits, the program "doesn't provide any training related to a person's skills and abilities," says David Schwartz, a poverty lawyer in Ventura County. Instead of giving needy Californians the opportunity to become employed, CWEP "will only help perpetuate the welfare system," says Beth La Rue, a Sacramento mother, welfare recipient and California Welfare Rights Organization vice president.

There are other criticisms of the project. One is that, because welfare clients don't get paid by the agency where they work 80 hours a month, CWEP resembles slavery. "It appears much like enforced servitude," says Ralph Abascal, a San Francisco poverty lawyer. As counsel for the welfare-rights group, Mr. Abascal has sought to get the work program declared illegal through a counterclaim to the state's lawsuit in Los Angeles.

One woman, a college-educated welfare client who refused an assignment to CWEP and so temporarily lost part of her grant, concurs with Mr. Abascal. "You don't get a dime. It's a form of slavery." With a bitter tone to her voice, she continued, "Either you go to work at a demeaning job or your children go hungry. Some choice."

But with a paycheck, "you could say you're off welfare," and the stigma of being a welfare recipient would be gone, argues Mr. Bayuga, the CWEP participant who counsels students. Retorts State Welfare Director Robert B. Carleson: "In practice it's the same thing as a paycheck. If he doesn't show up, he won't get paid." Anyhow, Mr. Carleson adds, CWEP wasn't designed as a welfare cure-all but rather as temporary community service while a welfare client continues to look for full-time work.

Still, not all the field administrators for CWEP remain as enthusiastic as Mr. Carleson. Some agree with welfare rights activists about the importance of a paycheck over a welfare grant. CWEP might reduce a recipient's dependency on welfare, says Tony Capritto, Ventura County CWEP supervisor, "if we could somehow firm up the recipient's relationship with the user agency to make it more of an employer and have the employing agency hand out the stipend."

Wayne Robertson, another administrator, says: "It's likely to be more damaging to the client to say he worked for the last 12 months for the Parks Department and then for the Parks Department to say, 'No, he was never working here, he was on a welfare program.' " A Welfare Department employment officer in Ventura County, Mr. Robertson acts as the liaison for CWEP between his agency and the human-resources department.

Four of six social workers brought over from Mr. Robertson's office to the human-resources department last June to help run the employables effort have already become disenchanted and requested transfers. "CWEP keeps recipients busy, but it isn't a solution in itself. And it doesn't result in people getting off welfare," says Sally Allen, a sociol-work supervisor. The social workers became unhappy partly because of political pressure from Sacramento to immediately assign welfare recipients to community work projects "if we didn't get them jobs or training the first day," says James Packer, the county's deputy welfare director.

Welfare Defeat: A False Economy

W-S-J 10/26/72

By JONATHAN SPIVAK

WASHINGTON — Critics of rising welfare costs are hailing the death in Congress of the administration's Family Assistance Program. From the beginning they argued that FAP would only result in a massive explosion of the relief rolls.

But their celebration may be short-lived. For indications are that welfare costs under the present system will rise more rapidly than they would have under the rejected administration plan. Indeed, it's possible that the conservatives who helped defeat the plan may in time come to a realization that the present system is more "liberal" in most respects than FAP, and possibly even that they took the wrong side of the issue—at least on fiscal grounds, if not philosophical ones.

A second chance won't come quickly. Whatever the administration proposes in the way of welfare legislation next year—and some expect it will propose a more "conservative" approach—Congress is not likely to act rapidly. After three years of fruitless grappling with FAP, lawmakers seem to be sick of the whole subject.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare estimates that FAP would have reduced total welfare outlays to poor families by $700 million from present levels in its first year of operation, and that the "savings" could have grown greater in future years. Among the most significant differences: FAP would have drastically curtailed the burgeoning food stamp program; enabled states to save money by cutting their own welfare benefit levels; imposed strict federal safeguards against fraud; and "taxed" the poor's outside earnings more severely than the current system.

Indeed, the welfare bill—HR I— that Congress finally killed had become so stingy from the liberals' point of view, that one HEW man could complain: "There's nothing wrong with HR I that a couple of billion dollars more wouldn't cure."

A Paradoxical Image

One of the paradoxical things about the FAP proposal is that it was tagged "liberal" from the beginning of the long three-year debate and never managed to shed that image, even though it grew steadily more restrictive and "conservative" as time passed. In the end, it can be argued, the Chamber of Commerce and other conservative groups might have been wiser to support FAP as an economy measure than battle it as a giveaway program.

For example, when FAP was first proposed in 1969, its annual income guarantee—$2,400 a year to a family of four—would have resulted in increased benefits in nine states. But even as the debate continued welfare payments rose above this level in four of the nine. Simultaneously, rising wages were reducing the number of working poor who would benefit from FAP payments to five million from 12 million. Payments under the present system, which decrease as earnings rise, fell off to about $500 million from $2.1 billion during the period. "A large part of the money which was going to be delivered under federal law (FAP) already has been delivered," comments one HEW man.

But just as FAP's liberality has been overestimated by the public and politicians, the generosity of the existing system has been underestimated. HEW's Aid to Families with Dependent Children grants has almost doubled in the last four years and the Agriculture Department's smaller food stamp program has grown tenfold. Indeed, the liberality of these existing programs persuaded the National Welfare Rights Organization, representing welfare recipients, to join the Chamber in opposing reform. NWRO's reasons may have been more perceptive than the Chamber's.

Existing welfare arrangements are advantageous for the poor in many significant respects. AFDC, much like the proposed administration plan, permits working mothers to retain a portion of their earnings as a supplement to relief. (About 20% of them now do so.) But it allows them to first deduct any expense required to hold a job, including private school fees, car payments, union dues, Social Security and income taxes.

As they work out in practice, these deductions mean the system is very liberal the way it is now, insists Jodie Allen of the Urban Institute. It's estimated, for example, that 4% of California AFDC recipients claim over $4,000 a year in work expenses. States have failed in attempts to limit the deductions.

A federal court ruled in a California case that recipients could deduct all work related expenses actually incurred without regard for their reasonableness, including pension fund contributions that were ultimately paid back to the worker. Federal courts also rejected efforts by Georgia and Pennsylvania to establish flat monthly maximums for work expenses.

FAP would have limited deductions to $60 a month, less than most states are now allowing. "It is necessary to close what sometimes amounted to open-ended deductions for work expenses under the current system," HEW argued in support of FAP. "This arrangement has resulted in . . . the receipt of assistance by some persons with upwards of $10,000 gross income."

AFDC is generous in other ways. Its grant formulas ignore irregular earnings. Thus, a recipient can earn well over the eligibility level on an annual basis, but still qualify for aid, if his earnings for the current month are below the guideline. (Theoretically, overpayments are recouped, but in practice recipients often don't have any money left to pay the government back.)

The Agriculture Department's food stamp program is even more generous. Like AFDC, the basic food stamp benefit of $1,296 a year to a penniless family of four is reduced as earnings rise. But numerous exclusions are allowed: all medical expenses if these exceed $10 per month per family; housing costs above 30% of net income; up to $30 a month in wages; day care expenses and educational fees.

Washington's Lack of Control

But perhaps the biggest growth factor of all is Washington's total lack of control over AFDC and food stamp spending. The programs are "open-ended," which means the federal government is obligated to furnish whatever funds the state programs require. Uncle Sam pays the full cost of food stamps and anywhere from 50% to 83% of a state's AFDC outlays. (The percentage varies from state to state.)

Food stamp spending has jumped to $2.3 billion a year from $250 million in 1969 and could reach $3 billion by 1975. The anti-hunger program enjoys powerful support on Capitol Hill, elicits a warm emotional response from the public and this seems likely to flourish.

AFDC costs, now $7.3 billion, have been rising at a rate of about 15% a year, although the trend is now unclear. Experiencing agonizing budget pinches, states have been seeking to retrench on welfare outlays, by forcing recipients to work for grants, requiring those on relief to carry identification cards and launching highly publicized fraud investigations.

FAP would not have been so openly punitive, but its solution to the welfare cost problem could have been more effective. FAP would have phased out most of the food stamp program and even given some of the poor less in cash than they now receive in stamps. By imposing a national welfare payment standard—generous in the rural South but well below the current level in most urban states—it would have freed HEW from the fiscal burden of subsidizing future state increases.

But now FAP is dead. And whatever else happens to welfare costs, one thing seems certain: the federal government will be stuck with most of the bill.

Welfare Impasse Resolved by Senate Vote Authorizing HEW to Test All Three Plans

10/5/72

By WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The Senate, as expected, resolved an impasse over which of three welfare programs to adopt by voting to test all of them.

By a 46-to-40 vote, the Senate accepted an amendment of Sen. William Roth (R., Del.) authorizing the Health, Education and Welfare Department to test the alternative plans for two to four years and report the results to Congress.

One program is a liberal-backed plan to establish a guaranteed annual income of $2,600 for a needy family of four. The Senate voted Tuesday against instituting that plan nationwide.

Also to be tested is a less-generous guaranteed-income plan that passed the House and has the Nixon administration's support, and a plan drafted by the Senate Finance Committee to remove many persons from welfare rolls and offer them government jobs instead.

None of the proponents of the various plans seemed particularly happy about acceptance of the testing proposal that will cost up to $400 milion a year. But it was apparent in debate on the welfare issue that support in the Senate was insufficient to establish any one of the rival programs as a replacement for the present welfare system.

The bill on which the welfare debate centers also contains an expansion of Social Security and Medicare benefits and a schedule of big increases in Social Security taxes starting next year.

Sen. Harry Byrd (Ind., Va.) said Saturday he would offer an amendment calling for tests of the various plans but he withdrew his proposal after learning Sen. Roth had been working for several months on a similar amendment.

ANOTHER TRY AT WELFARE REFORM

by

Vernon E. Jordan, Jr.

High on the list of priorities facing the new Congress when it convenes in January should be the question of welfare reform. By now this is an annual event -- welfare reform has been debated for the past three sessions.

Everyone agrees on just one point -- that the present welfare system is not working and badly needs overhauling. One of the major tasks facing the new Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, Caspar Weinberger,will undoubtedly be to brush up the Administration's Family Assistance Plan.

How successful renewed reform efforts will be depends on whether the aims of the welfare system are to cut costs or to help poor people. Confusion on that score helped to defeat previous versions. The Administration started off with a proposal that established the principle of federal assistance to all in need, but the plan was rewritten several times and each revision added layers of punitive measures that amounted to a war on the poor. The last Congress gave welfare reform an unceremonious burial, to the relief of all who want to see a just and equitable assistance program worked out.

The most recent development on the welfare scene was HEW's plan to tighten management of state welfare programs by taking away some $400 million a year because allegedly ineligible people were collecting welfare payments or were receiving overpayments.

This move illustrates the cost-cutting approach to welfare at the expense of the human needs the system is supposed to meet. Attention is focused on the statistics of payment distributions with no consideration given to the needs of the individuals involved. Regulations can be interpreted narrowly, resulting in apparent overpayments or they can be interpreted more broadly, in which case there is no pattern of overpayment. In this case, poor people may pay for managerial errors.

Whatever the bureaucratic mechanism employed, the recipients are still people who are poor and who are dependent upon public assistance for their rent payments and for their children's food. All the stress on statistical overpayments also neglected the many who get less than they are legally entitled to under the law. Playing a numbers game with welfare statistics does nothing about the real problems.

Real welfare reform will require a comprehensive program of tax reform, extension of social security benefits, increasing and extending unemployment compensation and minimum wages, family allowances, and above-poverty-line minimal federal assistance standards.

And for all the talk about "permissiveness" and the "work ethic," a massive job-creation program is needed to enable everyone who can work to have it. Study after study simply confirms that people on welfare want to work and share the same values as those who hold jobs. It's the economy that is the villain here, not the poor.

As national attention once again focuses on welfare reform, it would be most beneficial to remove the subject from the emotionally-supercharged atmosphere of myths and stereotypes about poor people and to concentrate instead on the ways in which our faltering economy can be made to work for everyone.

It may be easier to win headlines by attacking "cheats on welfare," but the problem of hunger and poverty will remain long after those headlines fade and the paper on which they are printed is recycled.

Attempts at welfare reform will be doomed if they once more degenerate into a circus-like competition to see whose plan can punish more people. The work ethic is just a faded idea if it exists in a vacuum created by lack of job opportunities, and welfare costs can be sharply cut if the nation is prepared to tolerate widespread hunger and misery.

The real goal of welfare reform has to be the relief of the hardships of poverty coupled with the expansion of opportunities for human growth and development. That's the lesson of the futile deadlock of the past several years.

Welfare Reform

A doctor I know in Chapel Hill gave me this article during Christmas. In addition to being interesting in its own right, it brings me to think we should be thinking in terms of what other kinds of research and evaluation of social experiments we need to push for in the South (HMO, for example).

A Negative-Income-Tax Experiment

Would payments to those who earned less than a certain amount reduce their incentive to work? The initial results of an unusual test with 1,300 families indicate that the payments would have no such effect

by David N. Kershaw

The welfare-reform proposals of both President Nixon and Senator McGovern embody the concept of the negative income tax: a downward extension of the income-tax system that would pay out cash (negative taxes) to families at the low end of the income scale. An essential feature of the concept is that as a family's income rises above the poverty level the tax payments are reduced by an amount less than the earnings, so that the family is always better off the higher its own earnings are. The concept was first presented to a broad public in 1962 by Milton Friedman of the University of Chicago, who argued that the negative income tax would strengthen the market economy and individual initiative by enabling poor people to make their own decisions on spending and saving and would cut back on the large and growing apparatus of social-welfare programs.

It is difficult to predict what the impact of a negative-income-tax plan would be on the people covered and on the economy. The word "experiment" is often applied to new social programs, but it is not used in the normal scientific sense. For the past four years, however, my colleagues and I at Mathematica Incorporated, working with a group at the Institute for Research on Poverty of the University of Wisconsin, have been conducting a more rigorous kind of social experiment to test the effects of a negative income tax. Money for the experiment was provided by the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity. The main objective of the work has been to explore the key question about the negative tax, namely the extent to which it would reduce the incentive of the recipients to work. The extent of such a work reduction will determine both the actual cost of a new program and whether or not it is acceptable to the taxpayers. Our preliminary findings indicate that a negative income tax does not significantly reduce the earnings of the recipients. We think the findings also point to the value of social experimentation as a tool for policy makers.

The need for some such technique arises from the large sums that the Government regularly commits to the eradication of one social ill or another: additional housing for the poor, health facilities for the elderly, medical care for the indigent, school lunches for poor children and so on. Since the supply of skills and money for these activities is limited, the legislative process becomes essentially a system of bargaining or of trading off one set of programs for another. On what basis do Government officials recommend one set of programs rather than another? What criteria do legislators employ to measure the probable effectiveness of one idea as opposed to another? The fact is that there have been few effective ways for determining the effectiveness of a social program before it is started; indeed, in most cases it is impossible even to forecast the cost of a new social program until it has been in operation for some time.

Clearly this situation is not conducive to sound and effective decision making. Moreover, it results in such unforeseen disasters as the Medicaid scandals, empty public-housing projects and relentlessly increasing costs for welfare programs. Social experimentation of the kind I am discussing is a tool that has been developed and tested in the past five years for avoiding unanticipated developments in new social programs and for measuring in advance what the programs will cost.

What is usually unforeseen in a new program is how the people affected by it will behave. What they do, of course, is likely to have a profound effect on the program. For example, in the Medicaid program unexpectedly high fees charged by physicians and hospitals and unexpectedly high use of the services took policy makers by surprise. Various behavioral changes induced in the recipients similarly determine the cost and effectiveness of new income-transfer programs. Since most major social programs will induce changes in behavior, which in turn will affect the program, it is clearly vital for policy makers to understand the magnitude and direction of such changes in behavior in advance in order to make the most rational choices among new programs.

A social experiment as we view it has the same general design as an experiment in the natural sciences. One undertakes to identify the experimental population, then to change one of the variables affecting its behavior and finally to compare its subsequent behavior with that of a control population in which the variable has not been changed. If the experiment is well designed, the investigator can attribute any difference in the behavior of the experimental population to the stimulus. The question we faced was whether or not this approach would work when the population consisted of human beings, when the laboratory was the community and when the stimulus was a complex new social program.

Our experiment was the first attempt to answer the question. The experiment has been conducted as the New Jersey Negative Income Tax Experiment because its first operations were in Trenton, although it was later extended to Scranton, Pa., as well as to three other cities in New Jersey: Paterson, Passaic and Jersey City. Negative-income-tax payments were begun in Trenton in August, 1968, and were ended in Scranton last month. The only part of the experiment now in progress is the analysis of the data.

The welfare-reform proposals of the two presidential candidates are among a number of negative-tax plans that have been advanced in recent years. Although the various plans differ in many ways, all of them are defined by two common variables: the guarantee level and the rate of reduction (sometimes called the tax rate) applied to the guarantee.

The guarantee is the amount paid to a family or an individual with no other income. In a negative-income-tax system the guarantee would be in effect a floor under incomes, providing a basic level of income for everyone. Various guarantee levels have been proposed, ranging from $2,400 annually for a family of four (the amount in H.R. 1, a House of Representatives bill incorporating the Administration's proposals for welfare reform) to $6,600 per year (advocated by the National Welfare Rights Organization).

The rate of reduction is the rate at which the negative-tax payments are reduced as the family's other income rises. The reduction is always less than the amount of the rise in other income. That is to say, for each dollar of other income the family receives, the negative-tax payment is reduced somewhat, but not dollar for dollar. A dollar-for-dollar reduction formerly applied in welfare programs, and the rate in such programs remains high today.

The guarantee and the rate of reduction can be combined in many ways. Suppose the guarantee is $3,000 and the rate of reduction is 50 percent [see illustration on opposite page]. A family with no earned income receives the full $3,000, and the reduction is not applied. If in the next year the family's earned income is $1,000, the rate of reduction of 50 percent means that the negative-tax payment to the family is reduced by $500. The family now receives $2,500 in negative-tax payments and $1,000 of its own income for a total of $3,500. The reduction works just as the positive income tax works; in this example the family is effectively in a 50 percent marginal tax bracket.

The key point is that the family's total income continues to rise as its earned income rises, notwithstanding the reduction in negative-tax payments. Just as in the positive-tax program, the family is always better off with a higher earned income. The point is important because it shows that the negative-income-tax system is designed to minimize the disincentive to work that has often been associated with welfare programs. People who are able to work keep a portion of their earnings just as people in the positive-tax system do.

In the example I have given, the family would continue to receive negative-tax payments until its own income reached $6,000. At that level the family would become a taxpayer rather than a tax recipient. As long as the level remained above $6,000 the family would receive no payments. If the income dropped below $6,000, the payments would be resumed.

Choosing the "best" combination of guarantee level and rate of reduction is a difficult problem. The two things one is most concerned with in a welfare system are (1) how much it will cost and (2) whether or not it will have a strong tendency to make the recipients disinclined to work. Unfortunately the objectives of low cost and minimum work disincentive are in direct conflict [see illustration on next page].

FIVE CITIES (color) where the negative-income-tax experiment was conducted were chosen from the Northeast because it is densely populated and has many working poor people. An ethnic balance was also sought. The negative-tax payments began in Trenton in 1968.

RELATION between the guarantee (color) and the earned income (gray) is charted for a guarantee of $3,000 and a rate of reduction of 50 percent. The guarantee is the amount paid under a negative-income-tax plan to a family with no other income; the rate of reduction is the rate at which negative-tax payments are reduced as other income rises. The reduction is always lower than the amount of the rise in other income, so that the recipient is always better off by having earnings than by relying solely on the negative tax.

The problem is evident if one envisions plans applying rates of reduction of 30, 50 and 70 percent respectively to a guarantee of $3,000. At 30 percent a family would continue to receive payments until its earned income reached $10,000, which is close to the median income in the U.S. for a family of four. Under this plan half of the families in the nation would be recipients of negative-tax payments. Although the low rate of reduction would presumably keep the work disincentive low, the cost would be very high. On the other hand, a rate of reduction of 70 percent would keep the cost of the system down but could severely limit the incentive to work.

The problem of establishing an appropriate guarantee level and rate of reduction, of ascertaining the effect of various combinations on work behavior and of estimating the cost of a national program led to a decision by the Office of Economic Opportunity that a field experiment should be undertaken as a way of obtaining evidence. In 1967 the office gave money for the experiment to the Institute for Research on Poverty and to Mathematica, which has its headquarters in Princeton, N.J. These organizations shared the responsibility of designing the experiment and of analyzing the data, and Mathematica set up the administrative system.

The design of the experiment was focused on the work-response issue. Given a guaranteed annual income, how much, if any, would recipients reduce their work effort? The designers of the experiment decided that the population of most interest consisted of intact families among the working poor. The work response of single-parent families and of the aged and disabled were of less interest. Data on the work response of single-parent families were partly available through the program of aid to families with dependent children, and it appeared that the cost of a guaranteed income for the aged and the disabled could be estimated without a field test since the variability of their response to negative-tax payments was limited. For these reasons the designers decided that the sample for the experiment should consist of intact families with able-bodied males between the ages of 18 and 58 who were either in the labor force or physically capable of entering it.

A second major decision concerned the method of choosing the participants. The designers considered a national sample, which would consist of families chosen on a random basis from places in every region of the country; a "saturation" experiment, consisting of all the eligible families in a given area, and a "test-boring" approach involving a limited number of families from several geographic areas. It appeared that a national sample would cost too much and would be risky administratively in view of how little was known about conducting a social experiment of this kind. The saturation approach was rejected both for its cost and because it was difficult to see how data from a single area would be helpful in making generalizations about a national negative-tax program. We decided on the test-boring approach.

Choosing the site involved several considerations. The first decision was to concentrate on an urban area, since most of the working poor live in cities. Second, we focused on the Northeast because it is densely populated and is close to Washington, so that the Office of Economic Opportunity could more easily participate in the decision making. In the end we settled on New Jersey because it is densely populated and has a substantial number of poor people. Moreover, the state government was interested in the experiment. Trenton was chosen as the pilot site because it is close to Princeton (and so to Mathematica) and because as the capital of New Jersey it facilitated liaison with state officials. Paterson, Passaic and Jersey City were added later because they are fairly large cities, and Scranton was added because its preponderance of white residents would bring an ethnic balance to a sample that was otherwise largely black or Puerto Rican.

The selection of families was based on two preliminary interviews: a 44-question screening survey administered to about 30,000 families in the five cities and a 340-question "pre-enrollment" interview administered to 2,300 families. Both interviews obtained information on the composition of the family and on income. In addition the pre-enrollment interview provided baseline measurements of certain other sociological and economic variables.

The designers decided to test three rates of reduction: 30, 50 and 70 percent. The reasoning was that this group of rates covered the relevant policy range, inasmuch as a national program would never be designed with a reduction rate lower than 30 percent (on cost grounds) or higher than 70 percent (on work-disincentive grounds). Four guarantee levels were established, ranging from $1,650 (half of the official poverty level for a family of four in 1967) to $4,125 (125 percent of the poverty level). Eight combinations of reduction rate and guarantee level were established, and each one was designated as a "plan" [see illustration on this page].

More than 1,300 families have been involved in the program, although some have dropped out and are not reflected in our data. Somewhat more than half of the 1,300 families were assigned to one or another of the eight negative-tax plans. The other families constituted a control group that received no negative-tax payments, although they were interviewed periodically just as the experimental families were. A control group is necessary in order to be able to compare the families receiving payments with families of similar situation who are not. In this way the experimenter can be sure that random events in the cities are not responsible for the results he is measuring.

In order to participate in the experiment the families in the group receiving payments were required only to report their correct income and any changes in family composition. The reports, which we verified through various auditing procedures, were made every four weeks to the Council for Grants to Families, a corporate body set up by Mathematica and the Institute for Research on Poverty to process and disburse payments. On the basis of income reported to the council, families were paid every two weeks by check sent by mail from Princeton. The council also had an office in each of the experimental cities to answer questions from the families and from Princeton.

Families were free to do whatever they wished with the payments. They also could move anywhere in the U.S. If a member left the original family unit, he or she still received a share of the family grant. Payments were excluded from taxable income under a ruling obtained from the Internal Revenue Service.

In addition to the income data on the forms mailed in by the experimental families every four weeks, information on the work response and other characteristics of the sample was obtained from interviews administered every three months by the Urban Opinion Surveys Division of Mathematica to both the experimental and the control families. The questionnaires sought information on such matters as participation in the labor force, financial status, medical and educational histories, family structure and political and social integration. Twelve such interviews were made, and a 13th quarterly interview was undertaken to ascertain what understanding the families had of the experiment.

We have now obtained a great deal of information about the 1,300 families. We shall be analyzing the results for another year. Unanalyzed portions of the data will be made available, under controlled conditions, to investigators over the next few years. Even though the analysis is not complete, we have reached a stage where it is possible to describe the principal results in a preliminary way.

The most important results, of course, are those that bear on the work response. The question to be asked here is: How did the work behavior of the families in the experimental group compare with the work behavior of the families in the control group? The preliminary results give no evidence indicating a significant decline in weekly earnings as a result of the introduction of the payments [see illustration on page 25]. About 31 percent of the families in the experimental group showed earning increases of more than $25 per week, compared with about 33 percent of the controls. About 25 percent of the experimental families showed earning declines of more than $25 per week, compared with 23 percent of the controls. These differences are too small to be regarded as statistically significant. That is a most encouraging finding.

A second finding in terms of work response was identified when improvements in the computer system enabled us to analyze indicators other than earnings. One such indicator was the number of hours worked. An analysis primarily made by Harold Watts of the University of Wisconsin, who is the principal inves-

EIGHT COMBINATIONS of guarantee and rate of reduction employed in the negative-tax experiment are indicated by the colored squares. The "poverty line" was established in 1967, when the negative-tax experiment was designed, as $3,300 per year for a family of four.

GUARANTEES AND REDUCTIONS are shown on the opposite page in various combinations. For each level of earned income the negative-tax payment (color) and the earned income (gray) are indicated for three rates of reduction. The problem in arriving at an optimum combination is that a low rate of reduction results in a costly negative-income-tax plan and a high rate tends to make the recipients less inclined to work to increase income.

WEEKLY EARNINGS of the families that received negative-tax payments (color) are compared with the weekly earnings of the "control" families (gray) at the beginning of the experiment. The control families received no payments but were treated otherwise in the same way as the families receiving negative-tax payments. Numeral at end of each bar shows number of families in the group.

ETHNIC DISTRIBUTION of the families in the experiment is indicated. The colored bars represent families that received negative-tax payments and the gray bars the control families. Until Scranton was added, most of the sample was either black or Puerto Rican.

FAMILY SIZE of participating families is charted. Again the colored bars represent families that received payments, the gray bars represent control families and the numerals give the number of families in each group. A member of a family who left the household after the beginning of the experiment continued to receive his or her proportionate share of the family's negative-tax payment.

tigator in the experiment, showed that the hours worked by families in the experimental group are about 12 percent fewer than the hours worked by families in the control group. The difference is statistically significant.

Close examination reveals that about 40 percent of the difference is attributable to primary earners in the experimental group who worked less than primary earners in the control group. The reasons appear to be small differences in overtime pay, in periods of unemployment and in time spent on a second job. The remaining 60 percent is attributable to spouses and other adult workers in the family. Interestingly enough, it does not appear that these people are leaving the labor force in comparison to the control group; instead it seems that they are entering the labor force less rapidly. This observation suggests that the reason for the lower number of hours worked in the experimental group may be that people in those families take longer to look for better jobs. The availability of the negative-income-tax payment enables the worker to do that instead of having to accept the first job he finds.

The possibility that recipients spend more time looking for better jobs is a hypothesis; it may not be the actual reason for the reduction in hours worked. Attributing precise causes is a complicated process. Further analysis may provide answers. In any case a reduction of only 12 percent suggests that the introduction of a national negative-income-tax program will not give rise to a tidal wave of voluntary idleness. It certainly would be encouraging if people are reducing their work hours in order to look for better jobs.

CHANGE OF EARNINGS of families that received negative-tax payments (color) and of control families (gray) is charted for the first two years of the experiment. "Increase" means a rise of more than $25 per week, "slight change" a rise or fall of less than $25 and "decrease" a decline of more than $25. Since the comparisons are so close, there is no statistically valid evidence that the payments curbed the recipients' incentive to work.

We have also obtained information on the attitudes of the people in our experimental and control populations toward work. There would appear to be little reason for low-income workers to adhere to the "Protestant ethic." Why should they consider work a good thing? In the labor market they have met discrimination, low wages, poor working conditions and arbitrary layoffs. For some reason, however, the people we interviewed generally supported the idea of work. This attitude could prove significant if the nation undertakes to develop an income-maintenance system that provides a smooth transition from poverty to reasonable affluence.

It is conceivable that the most important and lasting result of the New Jersey experiment will be the support it provides for the idea of social experimentation. Although the experiment encountered a number of serious unforeseen problems, in general it worked: families were chosen and assigned to experimental or control groups, money was paid, interviews were conducted, data were assembled, analysis was done and results were sent to Washington, where policy makers used them. A more rigorous question is whether social experimentation is a cost-effective way of obtaining answers to policy questions.

The weaknesses of the method are fairly clear: it is an expensive way of gathering information (the cost of the New Jersey experiment will be almost $10 million in the end); it takes a long time to get results, since measuring human behavior with confidence requires at least several years, and it is difficult to control the environment of the experiment. The strengths of social experimentation as a policy tool are also rather clear: it is the only way to obtain information on some kinds of behavioral change before a new program is introduced; it is the best way to collect precise information on specific issues because it is carefully structured and controlled, and it can help to focus the attention of able and imaginative scholars and professionals on new issues. On balance, social experimentation has thus far proved to be an effective new tool.

The New Jersey experiment has given rise to, or at least encouraged, a number of other social experiments. The rural negative-income-tax experiment, sponsored by the Office of Economic Opportunity and conducted by the Institute for Research on Poverty, covers 800 rural families in Iowa and North Carolina. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has provided money for income-maintenance experiments in Seattle, Gary, Ind., and Denver and also for the Vermont family-assistance-planning study, which was designed to explore the more important administrative issues in the Family Assistance Plan. The experiments in housing allowance, sponsored by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, give housing vouchers to poor families in several cities with the aim of studying the response of families and landlords, the demand and supply of housing and how a national housing-allowance program might be administered. The Office of Economic Opportunity is sponsoring an education-voucher demonstration and a health-insurance experiment. The education-voucher program seeks to measure the effect on communities and students of giving all parents in a particular area vouchers good for education at a school of their choice. In the health-insurance experiment about 2,000 families will be placed on various health-insurance plans to measure how the utilization of medical services changes in response to differences in the cost of medical care.

Other social experiments are under consideration. They involve such issues as child care, problems of income measurement and administrative techniques in cash-assistance programs. One can anticipate that an increasing number of policy decisions on major social programs will be made with the assistance of information obtained through social experiments undertaken to explore these issues and others yet unforeseen.

While mother works

Who needs day care?

Robin does. Her mother is divorced and works as a clerk for the city government. At noon, Robin comes home to their small apartment from her split-session, third grade class. Then 8-year-old Robin is on her own until her mother arrives home at six.

George does. When his father deserted the family, his mother found work as a cafeteria worker in a hospital. His sister, who is 11, dropped out of school to care for 3-year-old George.

Alice does. Her father is a salesman who was seriously disabled in an automobile accident. Her mother has gone back to teaching. Alice, at 18 months, is in the care of a maid who is clean and efficient, but without warmth or humor or interest in children.

Joseph does. Both his parents are college students who work part-time. In the 6 months since his birth, Joseph's daily routine has consisted of being handed from neighbor to neighbor in the trailer park where his young parents live.

Paul does . . . and so do his brothers and sisters. Paul is the youngest, almost 2; the oldest in this family of nine children is 12. Their father is unemployed, their mother hospitalized. The family lives in two rooms in a slum tenement; they eat—and even sleep—in shifts.

Jerry and Sharon do. When their mother died last month, Grandma moved in to help. But active twins, aged 2, are too much for Grandma; the household is frantic, untidy, unhappy. The twins' father cannot afford a housekeeper, has trouble providing even the necessities of life. But he cannot face giving up his children to foster parents.

Day care is a service for any child who is threatened with neglect during any part of the day. Day care is needed by many millions of children, from homes that are well-to-do and homes that are poverty-stricken . . . from families that are broken or disrupted or whole . . . in communities that are urban, suburban, or rural.

Mothers of 6 million pre-school children are working. What happens to them—and millions of older children—while their mother earns—or helps to earn—the family living?

Unions show the way

Five days a week, forty kids aged three to thirteen report at 7:30 a.m. to the Park Village Day Care Center in Cleveland.

Pre-school children participate in educational programs, receive three nutritious meals and are well-cared for by trained professionals. Older children attend school but return to the center for lunch and after school lets out.

The children are from low income families. Their parents work or are enrolled in job training programs. Few can afford to pay for any child care at all and none could ordinarily afford the quality care the children at Park Village receive.

But Park Village is special. It is sponsored by two unions with a sense of community spirit, SEIU Local 47 and Local 427 of the Meatcutters. They financed the construction of the center and bought the furniture and other equipment. The unions pay for the utilities and custodial care, and, when necessary bail out the center financially with emergency funds.

WORKING PARENTS pay what they can afford, based on a sliding scale of fees and the County welfare department pays for the children of families on public assistance.

No Local 47 members directly benefit from the center, although they may send their children. "It is truly rendering a community service," says Mrs. Gladys Scipio, Park Village's director. "The parents in the area are working or trying to obtain job skills to help lift their families out of poverty. Without the center they simply could not provide proper care for their children."

At the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Day Care Center in Chicago, 60 children are cared for in a comfortable, airy building open from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., five days a week, 50 weeks a year. The teaching staff is comprised of a director, five fully accredited teachers and four assistant teachers. There is also a full-time cook, a part-time psychiatric social worker, part-time volunteers and an attending pediatrician and dentist. All medical and dental care is provided at no cost to the parent.

EACH CHILD receives breakfast, a hot lunch and a mid-morning and mid-afternoon snack, all prepared in a fully-equipped, on-premises kitchen.

The building is single-story with no permanent walls within, enabling shifting screens to enlarge, enclose or alter. It features super graphic designs, is fully carpeted and has outdoor play areas.

The program is rich and varied. There are learning groups, freeplay, outdoor play or physical education programs, directed active play time and creative activities. At least once a month the children go on field trips to museums and other places of interest.

The cost of maintaining the children in the center is estimated to be $2900 annually per child. It is totally free to the member; the center is financed by the Amalgamated Social Benefits Fund which is employer contributed and union administered.

PARK VILLAGE and the Chicago center run by the Clothing Workers are examples of labor and industry's response to the child care crisis in this country. Centers like them are scarce. But, a comprehensive child care bill recently passed by the Senate may bring the federal government to the rescue of millions of working mothers who desperately need good child care.

Mothers of six million pre-school children in the United States are working. Government, industry and labor all have a stake in the problem of how to take care of them while their mothers work.

Until the last few years, day care centers were regarded as an arrangement only for the children of welfare or disadvantaged families. This is no longer true. Millions of women from middle income families are working to supplement their husband's income.

Welfare - Gen

Burson Praises Nixon Stance

By STEVE BALL JR.

For a long time state welfare director Bill Burson has felt the federal government should, as the old saying goes, "Do something even if it's wrong," about its welfare program.

Now, Burson feels, President Richard Nixon has done precisely that.

"The President has performed a great service in saying the present welfare system has failed," Burson declared this weekend in an interview in which he explained in detail for the first time his views of the new Nixon welfare proposals.

"If he doesn't accomplish anything else, I think he has performed a service for which history will bless him," Burson continued.

"In general I agree with the President in starting a debate that hopefully will result in a program that will solve rather than perpetuate welfare problems."

WILLIAM H. BURSON
Gives Welfare Views

BUT THEN the Georgia director got down to some specifics which, incidentally, he likely will present some day to the U.S. Senate Finance Committee since he is one of six persons requested by Connecticut Sen. Abraham Ribicoff, former secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, to serve in an advisory capacity during hearings on the new welfare legislation.

First, Burson wonders, "aren't we putting the cart before the horse to federalize AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) and not the adult categories which need only money?

He explained that Nixon is proposing doing away with the AFDC program by providing a minimum benefit of $1,600 a year for a family of four and, apparently, dropping all assistance other than monetary (caseworkers, etc.). Direct federal payments to families would thus "federalize" the program.

On the other hand, Burson pointed out, the state's main obligation to the adult categories—the aged, the blind and the disabled—is almost wholly financial. These categories could more easily be taken over by Washington or, as Burson put it, "Let the federal govern-where people are able to work," Burson said he does not believe Nixon "took as much pain as he should to point out that nine out of 10 can't work because they're too old, too sick or too young."

Burson also expressed concern that while Nixon made proposals to require fewer mothers to work, thus helping solve "the immediate problem of day care centers," the President's plan would likely "intensify the problem of culturally deprived child."

"He proposed nothing approaching a preschool program for children on the same level as a training program for adults," Burson said.

"Tomorrow's problem is not going to be solved except through a pre-school program that gives a child the incentive to be more productive than his parents."

Also, Burson said, "Mr. Nixon didn't mention at all the ultimate solution—family planning.

"IT'S TRUE," he added, "that he sent a separate message on that." But, he said, the birth control emphasis should have been tied closely to the welfare proposals.

In all, Georgia is scheduled to get $20.8 million from Nixon's

First, Burson wonders, "aren't we putting the cart before the horse to federalize AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) and not the adult categories which need only money?

He explained that Nixon is proposing doing away with the AFDC program by providing a minimum benefit of $1,600 a year for a family of four and, apparently, dropping all assistance other than monetary (caseworkers, etc.). Direct federal payments to families would thus "federalize" the program.

On the other hand, Burson pointed out, the state's main obligation to the adult categories—the aged, the blind and the disabled—is almost wholly financial. These categories could more easily be taken over by Washington or, as Burson put it, "Let the federal government do the paper-handling."

It is, in fact, the administration's apparent intention to abandon all but financial assistance to families that has Burson most concerned.

"IF THE AFDC category is abolished," he asked, "what happens to our case workers, family planning program, even Medicaid? Where are the people getting help (in addition to money) going to get the help they need? There's complete silence on this point."

Burson paused and grinned, "As a matter of fact, this could put welfare case workers on welfare," then quickly added that was really beside the point.

"Admittedly the welfare organizations have been saying all along they don't want services, they want money—period," he conceded. "But, I wish I thought our clients could solve their own problems—the managing of money, how to keep kids in school, etc.—but the fact that they are our clients shows they can't.

"Without services, we'll just rear another generation like the present generation."

Burson said the "thing I question the most" is the formulas involved in AFDC. "Mr. Nixon is going to get us out of one complicated, unworkable formula into another complicated, unworkable formula on how the money is allocated."

The Nixon formula of a family keeping the first $60 of its monthly income then having its assistance benefits reduced 50 cents for every dollar earned above $60 is "very complicated for even the caseworkers to understand."

"I feel," he said, "it would be simpler to have the $1,600 minimum floor everywhere and then have states match dollar for dollar up to the poverty level."

SEVERAL of Burson's questions about the proposals are financial. He feels, for example, that "the South is going to get left with the short end of the stick again."

As he understands it, Burson said, states that now pay more than $1,600 a month to a family of four would be required only to pay the difference between that $1,600 and their present level while states below the $1,600 level would be required to put up 50 per cent of their AFDC budgets to help the federal government defray costs.

While Burson was especially enthusiastic because Nixon emphasized that the present welfare system breaks up families by penalizing working fathers, and heartily agrees that "work is a factor in those programs would likely "intensify the problem of culturally deprived child."

"He proposed nothing approaching a preschool program for children on the same level as a training program for adults," Burson said.

"Tomorrow's problem is not going to be solved except through a pre-school program that gives a child the incentive to be more productive than his parents."

Also, Burson said, "Mr. Nixon didn't mention at all the ultimate solution—family planning.

"IT'S TRUE," he added, "that he sent a separate message on that." But, he said, the birth control emphasis should have been tied closely to the welfare proposals.

In all, Georgia is scheduled to get $20.8 million from Nixon's revenue-sharing plan and save $12.5 million in welfare—a $33.3 million windfall, Burson said.

"I can't reconcile a windfall to the state of Georgia with the great need we have now," Burson declared. "I feel we need to do more rather than less."

The Nixon proposals would, of course, he hastily added, raise the level of assistance in Georgia. The maximum payment for a family of four now under AFDC is $102 a month. That would go to $1,600 a year.

The average payment in Georgia to the aged now is $50.66 a month, to the blind $62.21 and to the disabled $60.60. Nixon would establish a national minimum of $65 a month.

Generally, Burson questions the estimated cost of the Nixon proposals. Some knowledgeable people estimate it at $14 billion rather than the $4 billion price tag the administration uses, he said.

And, he wonders if things like the variation in federal aid to states which pay over his proposed minimum and those which pay less and the lack of any mention of welfare services aren't part of the reason the advertised cost is too low.

BUT, HE nevertheless is gratified that Nixon has "done something" and hopeful that by the time Congress gets through with its debate that "something" will be right.

STORM

All craft around Jamaica and Grand Cayman were warned to remain in safe harbor.

The storm was headed toward Bajo Nuevo and Pedro Cays, islands south of Jamaica which the Hurricane Center believed were uninhabited.

Francelia's present course would take her over the same area where killer Hurricane Camille was born and started her vicious charge across the western tip of Cuba enroute to the Louisiana-Mississippi Gulf coast.

The Hurricane Center said besides the gale winds, Jamaica —especially the coastal areas— will be lashed by heavy rains.

HURRICANE WATCHERS said the storm was located at Latitude 15.4 north, Longitude 75.8 west, or about 180 miles south southeast of Kingston, Jamaica.

Simpson said, "There is some possibility of a turn to a more northerly course" which would take the storm across Jamaica and then Cuba.

How Useful Are Welfare

By JONATHAN SPIVAK

WASHINGTON — "On balance, the Family Assistance Plan is not welfare reform. . . . It is a giant step backward. It is worse than the present inadequate welfare system. FAP must be opposed and defeated by those who believe in improving the conditions and opportunities of poor people." So says the militant National Welfare Rights Organization.

"While the country is desperate for real welfare reform—something to begin curbing welfare rolls and costs—HRI (the family assistance bill) is a step in the opposite direction. . . . It would make so many more people eligible for welfare that our relief rolls could reach 15 million persons in 1973, twice the figure for 1970." So says the National Chamber of Commerce.

So just what is the welfare reform bill due to be debated by the House this week—a conservative crackdown or a liberal giveaway? Would it force hapless mothers with little tots to leave their homes and labor as domestic servants, or would it encourage thousands of gainfully employed workers to rush to the dole of a guaranteed annual income?

Following the pattern of previous welfare reforms, the new bill probably can be expected to do a little of both. It's a schizoid mixture of stringent work requirements designed to cut back relief rolls and more generous grants designed to ease the poor's financial plight. Less powerful blends of this same "tough-tender" antidote were administered in the government's 1962 and 1967 welfare reforms, and it's significant that neither reform had much success in cutting welfare costs.

The mixture is being applied again, however, because Congress finds it politically essential to "crack down on cheaters" and exalt the virtues of work whenever it enlarges the welfare program and makes grants more generous. The result is the appearance of cutbacks but the reality of expanded cost.

Either out of cynicism or lack of knowledge, each new attempt to make the welfare program more capable of caring for the poor acted in 1962 would provide the basis for getting these people on their feet and off the relief rolls," complained Rep. John Byrnes, the Wisconsin Republican and key welfare legislator. "We were shocked to see what little effect that legislation actually had."

CWT was succeeded in 1965 by Title V of the anti-poverty program, which paid the total costs of work and training programs for welfare recipients. Title V had more money, over $100 million a year, and offered greater financial incentives to the states to participate. More persons were trained, but the end results were not much more encouraging.

"By the time Ways and Means was holding hearings in 1967 on public assistance legislation, the facts were that 133,000 welfare recipients had enrolled in the programs since 1964, 22,000 had found jobs, and 70,000 were in training, but the total number of recipients of AFDC (Aid to Families With Dependent Children) had increased by 800,000 during the three years. In an Alice-in-Wonderland kind of situation, the more work training successes reported, the larger the population dependent on public relief became," reports Gilbert Steiner, a Brookings Institution welfare expert in his book "The State of Welfare" (Brookings).

By 1967 the AFDC rolls were growing at an alarming rate, states were facing mounting fiscal problems meeting their welfare costs and the lawmakers were desperate for solutions. Congress thereupon gave renewed impetus to work and training programs for AFDC recipients. (The aged, blind and the disabled who presumably couldn't help themselves simply got bigger grants). The Welfare Reform Act of 1967 set up a new program, known as WIN for Work Incentive. WIN required able-bodied recipients—including mothers, much to the consternation of liberals—to register at local Labor Department offices and take suitable work or training. To help them, more money was provided for manpower education and day care.

The aim of the new measure, said the lawmakers, was "reducing the AFDC rolls by restoring more families to employment and self-reliance, thus reducing federal financial involvement in the program."

Needless to say, it has not turned out that way: Since 1967 the AFDC rolls have doubled from 5 million to 10 million recipients. WIN did not really get off the ground until mid-women WIN graduates is $2 an hour and for men $2.50 an hour, the Labor Department reports.

The drop-out rate is high, and many participants return to the welfare rolls. Administrators maintain that the potential of the program has not been attained because of the shortage of day-care facilities for children; federal financing now makes day care available to only 50,000 children. But even if this problem were solved, elementary arithmetic suggests that the fiscal payoff is not very promising. The cost of day care is about $2,000 a year per child. If work expenses are added, it's probably cheaper for the government to let mothers stay at home.

Emphasis Unchanged

Despite all the difficulties of the past, the administration's current welfare reform measure continues to emphasize the work ethic. "Congress feels there's a hell of a difference between people who ought to be working and those who can't," explains one welfare expert. The Family Assistance Plan extends the work requirement to women with pre-school children, provides far more money for day care and requires able-bodied recipients to get their payments from the Labor Department. The aim, the lawmakers report, is to create "a system of assistance which will maximize the incentive and the obligation of those who are able to work to help themselves . . . to move every family in which there are employable adults toward employment and economic independence."

The forecasts now are that these work provisions will result in 1.3 million fewer persons on the relief rolls by 1976. Maybe this will happen. But nine years of effort and three programs don't offer great hope.

There's no doubt that the Family Assistance Plan embodies fundamental welfare reforms. It would establish the first uniform national eligibility standards for welfare recipients; guarantee poor families an annual income of $2,400; reduce the inequities between welfare payments in destitute and wealthy states; give the "working poor" supplemental income if their earnings fall below $4,320 a year.

But the plan is also a perpetuation of the past. It offers bigger grants—$2.3 billion more a year for the aged, blind and disabled, and poor families—coupled with vigorous work re-

Work Rules?

... angle of vision for the parade of freaks and funnymen.

A female Hercules in Wagnerian garb accepts the challenge of a huge Miss Tarzan; a mermaid named Neptuna smiles at us with her icy blue lips; Siamese twins in their formaldehyde womb are displayed for their beauty; the clowns in their grotesque makeup batter each other with jesting cruelties, and all to the frenetic lyricism of Nino Rota's music.

To the child, the circus is terrifying. "The clowns didn't make me laugh, they frightened me," he tells us.

But that fear exists outside the tent as well, since the travesty of the circus is, to the boy Fellini, at one with the inherent absurdity of the real world. He recalls for us a midget nun, a vulgar old lecher, a madman who plays at battle after seeing war movies, and a gorgeous theatrical duo who appear in the local billiard hall. "The world," our true narrator the adult Fellini tells us elsewhere, "is peopled with clowns."

We are not, however, allowed the smug pleasure of seeing only these oddballs as clowns. The circus is the world, the world is the circus and we are all implicated, even Mr. Fellini himself. He and his good-sized crew climb out of a tiny car in a delicious parody of parody. Projectors fail; aged film clips of aged clowns are ridiculously short.

But it is not to criticize that these connections are made; it is not to tell us all life is absurd and we are ridiculous figures on a garish stage. The magnificent ending of the film refutes these possibilities affirming, as it does, both the clowns themselves and the tendencies in man Fellini sees them as embodying: "his thrust toward the lofty, and his push towards the base."

In a stunning sequence, we witness the mock funeral of Auguste, the tramp clown. But Auguste, like the aging clowns we have encountered throughout the film, refuses to die. He rises from his comical coffin to the heights of a confetti colored heaven and flies amid streamers, his cables obvious, but angelic and aloft nevertheless.

An old clown expresses his pleasure at the act and with a gentle melancholy recalls one of his own routines. In a vast, empty hall, out

On Film

By Joy Gould Boyum

A new film by Federico Fellini is a major cultural event. For although the status of film as art may be insecure, that of Fellini as major artist is not. Whatever the response to his individual works, his genius is as unquestioned as his success. "The Clowns," his most recent work, can only confirm his reputation as master film maker.

"The Clowns" may frustrate whatever expectations the uninitiated audience brings to the film experience. It has no plot, at least in the sense of a casual sequence of events, nor does it offer developed characterizations.

Even more disorienting, it seems to refuse the illusion of reality, the basic bit of artifice which would persuade us that what we are witnessing is actual life and not an image of it.

"The Clowns" insists on itself as film. We see before us Federico Fellini, himself as himself, and we are introduced directly to his cameramen and crew whom we follow from circus to circus as they record the film we are presumably seeing now. But in compelling our attention to itself as medium, the film intensifies the illusion it would seem to deny. It forces our surrender to its reality when in the end it is art.

The film's ultimate refusal, and perhaps its most elaborate dissimulation, is its explicit denial that it carries a message (and by implication, a meaning). "Signor Fellini," an interviewer asks the director in the course of the film, "What message are you trying to give us here?" Fellini, about to answer (or then again, not to answer) is suddenly assaulted by a clown's bucket which, landing upside down directly on his head, conveniently muffles him.

The result of all this apparent formlessness should be perplexing confusion, if not precious trickery; but it is instead triumphant cinema, accessible to any who will open themselves to its dynamic and joyful vision of fantasy.

The imaginative world literally constructed before us is, of course, that of the circus, with its chief players, the clowns, and its P. T. Barnum, Federico Fellini, the maestro who stages the spectacle of comedy and terror with extraordinary wit and above all, a wry but pervasive nostalgia. What in fact shapes the film is a loving remembrance of things past and the consequent excursion towards rediscovery and revival.

"The clowns of my childhood where are they?" Fellini asks. This question, which comes less as an intrusion than as an assertion of the film's subjectivity, is what "The Clowns" attempts to answer.

Appropriately, we enter this world through the vantage point of a child, watching with him the raising of tents in the shadowy night that is the traditional environment of dreams. In the morning, we follow the boy in his sailor suit, shortly to become spectators to the circus performance, an emphatically stationary camera our angle of vision for the parade of

RISING WELFARE COSTS SPUR DEMANDS FOR CHANGE

President Nixon's welfare recommendations, expected to include proposals for the first major innovations in the welfare system since it was created by the Social Security Act of 1935, are scheduled to be submitted to Congress Aug. 8.

Momentum for reform of the system has been building since the early 1960s.

In the words of the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders: "The failures of the system alienate the taxpayers who support it, the social workers who administer it and the poor who depend on it." The Commission might have added local and state governments to the list of those who object to its costs and administrative problems.

Welfare costs have soared in recent years with growing numbers of recipients added to the rolls. Nationally, relief rolls have risen almost 10 percent a year since the mid-1960s, with most of the increase in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program.

In December 1968, almost 9.7 million persons received aid under state and federal public assistance programs—a 9.5 percent increase over December 1967. Total cost in 1968 was $9.8 billion—an increase of $2 billion over 1967.

The public assistance programs provide aid to the blind, physically disabled, elderly poor and dependent children. Medical assistance for the needy is also provided through Medicaid. The costs of the programs are shared by local, state and federal governments.

In addition, many states offer other types of welfare assistance for which there is no federal reimbursement—a category of aid called "general assistance."

The highest welfare costs come in the AFDC program, because it has the largest number of participants. From 1949 to 1959 the increase in AFDC recipients was one million, from 1959 to 1968 the increase was three million. The January 1969 total of AFDC recipients nationwide was 6.2 million persons. The program cost a total of $815 million in 1958 and $2.5 billion in 1968.

Why the upsurge in welfare rolls has taken place is uncertain. Several explanations have been offered.

One possible explanation is the migration of rural poor to the cities. In rural areas, the poor may have been able to scratch out a meager existence on farms; when they arrive in the cities, they often lack the skills needed for employment. Unemployment coupled with higher living costs often leads them to welfare.

Greater federal participation in the public assistance programs also has been considered as causing welfare rolls to grow. As the Federal Government has increased its share of welfare costs, local governments have been able to ease requirements and increase grants. The national average AFDC payment for a family of four rose from $113 a month in 1960 to $168 in 1968.

Until 1960, the rate at which AFDC applications were accepted remained stable at 55 percent. In 1968, 75 percent of all who applied for the program were approved for assistance.

Court decisions also have influenced the trend to larger numbers of welfare recipients. The most recent major decision on welfare—the April 21 ruling of the Supreme Court that residency requirements for welfare eligibility are unconstitutional—promises an increase of 100,000 to 200,000 in the AFDC program.

The antipoverty program also may play a part in rising welfare costs through its efforts to encourage the poor to organize. The growing militancy of persons on welfare has led to the formation of the National Welfare Rights Organization. The group claims 250 affiliated local welfare rights organizations with more than 30,000 members (mostly welfare mothers) in 100 cities. Its major demand is a "guaranteed adequate income" system providing $5,500 a year for a family of four.

History

(For history of public assistance programs, see Congress and the Nation p. 1225)

The most important welfare bill ever passed by Congress was the Social Security Act of 1935 (PL 74-271).

Enacted in the midst of the Depression, the Act changed both the concept of personal economic security in the United States and the nature of federal-state relationships in the welfare field.

The heart of the Social Security Act consisted of five programs: old-age insurance, unemployment insurance, Old-Age Assistance, Aid to the Blind and Aid to Dependent Children.

The old-age insurance program (officially called Old-Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance or OASDI) provides retirement benefits to persons who contribute to the system through their working years. Unemployment insurance is financed through a payroll tax on employer and employee.

The programs generally considered "welfare" programs today are the three programs of public assistance authorized under the Act—Old-Age Assistance (OAA). Aid to the Blind (AB) and Aid to Dependent Children (now called Aid to Families with Dependent Children or AFDC).

In 1950, a fourth public assistance program was added: Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled (APTD) (PL 81-734).

Another program sometimes included in a discussion of welfare is the Medicaid program, begun in 1960 as Medical Assistance for the Aged (PL 86-778). The program was designed to provide aid to elderly persons not poor enough to qualify for Old-Age Assistance but judged by the states to be "medically needy." In 1965 the medical assistance program was extended to all persons on public assistance.

All the programs operate in the same basic manner. The states make monthly cash payments to eligible indigent persons to pay for their living expenses, and the Federal Government reimburses the states for part of their costs. Assistance under all programs is limited to persons judged needy by the states.

Changes have been made periodically in the federal-state formulas for the public assistance programs, with the federal share increasing each time. In 1950, Congress permitted the Federal Government to reimburse the states not only for money payments made to recipients under the four programs but also for "vendor" payments for medical care—payments by the state directly to doctors, hospitals, etc., for treatment of public assistance recipients. To compute the federal reimbursement, the amount of money payments to an individual and vendor payments made for his medical care were added together, and the regular public assistance formula was applied against the total.

In 1958, a partial sliding scale for matching was adopted, which varied the federal reimbursement from state to state in accordance with the state's per-capita income. States with per-capita income lower than the national average received more favorable matching than states with per-capita income higher than the national average. Another change in the 1958 amendments based all future matching computations on average state spending per person, instead of requiring individual computations for each beneficiary.

Following is a description of the programs:

Old-Age Assistance—A program of monthly cash payments to support indigent persons aged 65 and over. Under the original matching formula in the 1935 Act, the Federal Government agreed to reimburse the states for half of any amount up to $30 a month. Maximum federal reimbursement was therefore $15 per person aided.

The most recent change in the formula was made in 1965, when the federal share was raised to 31/37 of the first $37. The Federal Government also pays 50 to 65 percent of the remaining state cost, with the percentage depending on state per-capita income. The maximum federal payment is $75 a month per recipient.

Aid to the Blind—This program is identical to Old-Age Assistance in administration, methods of operation and federal matching formula, but it applies to blind adults rather than the elderly.

Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled—Established in 1950, this program also uses the same formula and other administrative methods of Old-Age Assistance.

Aid to Families with Dependent Children—A program of support for needy children deprived of normal parental support because of death, incapacity or absence from the home of a parent. Typically, the states (on the basis of a test of need) make payments to help a woman with no husband support her children.

In the beginning, the Federal Government reimbursed the state for one-third of the first $18 monthly state payment for one child and one-third of the first $12 for each additional child.

The AFDC formula now provides a maximum federal monthly payment of $32 per recipient. The formula provides a federal share of five-sixths of the first $18 and 50 to 65 percent of the balance, depending on state per-capita income.

Medicaid—The Social Security Amendments of 1960 (PL 86-778) created a program of Medical Assistance to the Aged (MAA) under which the Federal Government reimbursed the states for 50 to 80 percent of state expenditures for medical care for the indigent elderly. The percentage depended on per-capita income in the state.

When Congress established the Medicare program in 1965 (PL 89-97), it provided a new Title XIX to the Social Security Act to combine all the medical provisions for the needy in the act. The MAA program was extended to needy persons who were eligible for public assistance and, if the state desired, to needy children who did not qualify for public assistance. The formula of federal reimbursement was raised to between 55 and 83 percent.

Costs and Recipients

In 1945, total spending by state, local and federal governments for public assistance, combined with the wholly state-financed general assistance programs, came to $987.9 million. Of this total, the federal share was $401.9 million or 40.7 percent.

By 1963, total welfare spending had risen to $4.7 billion, of which the federal share was $2.7 billion or 55.7 percent. In June 1968, when the total had reached $8.9 billion, the federal share was $4.7 billion or 55.8 percent.

State spending for welfare varies. The taxpayer in New York City pays 12 times as much in local and state taxes for welfare as does the taxpayer in Mississippi.

AFDC draws the most fire of any of the welfare programs. Taxpayers complain about the fast growth and increasing costs of the program.

Many citizens, according to opinion surveys and the comments of Members of Congress, believe that many persons in the program would rather claim welfare than work.

Welfare mothers complain that they cannot adequately support their children on the payments and that the whole system is demeaning and punitive.

It has been estimated that there are 15 million needy children in the United States, of whom about 4.6 million are eligible for AFDC payments. The majority of the remaining 1.6 million AFDC recipients are mothers.

According to the National Commission on Civil Disorders (the Kerner Commission), two-thirds of the poor receive no federal money at all, while the one-third who are eligible for public assistance receive only one-half of what they need. In 1968, an Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) official told a Congressional committee that more than 55 percent of the men between age 22 and 54 who headed poor households worked full-time and were still poor.

The National Commission on Urban Problems estimated in mid-1968 that there were only about 80,000 employable males among the 8.4 million persons then on relief.

Income Maintenance Proposals

Since the early 1960s, proposals have been advanced for replacing the welfare system with a guaranteed annual income. That term has included a variety of different plans, including a negative income tax. The basic principle of a guaranteed income is that the Federal Government would make up the difference between a family's earnings and an income determined to be the minimum necessary for a family to live.

Listed below are several of the variations proposed for a guaranteed income system:

Direct full cash payments—In this plan, an income floor, or basic standard level of income, would be established. Direct cash payments would be made to anyone whose income was below the floor.

This system was first proposed by British economist and sociologist Robert Theobald. He called it Basic Economic Security (B.E.S.) The system would guarantee each adult an income of $1,050, and each child, $650, or a total yearly income of $3,400 for a family of four. There would be recalculations of these amounts annually, and no requirement that the recipient work.

Under the Theobald plan, if a family of four had no private income, it would receive a full government allowance of $3,400. If it had an income of $2,000 it would be entitled to $1,400 in government payments and on top of that would receive $200 as a 10 percent premium for earning $2,000 on its own. If a family had income in excess of $3,400 it would not be entitled to any government payments.

Negative Income Tax—The concept of the negative income tax was first developed by University of Chicago economics professor Milton Friedman.

The Friedman plan would work this way:

Under current tax law, a family of four has exemptions plus standard deductions equal to $3,400. Hence if the family had income of $3,400 it would pay no tax—$3,400 would be the break-even point. If the family had no income, it would receive a payment from the Government of $1,700, or 50 percent of the $3,400 break-even figure. If the family had a pre-tax income of $2,000, it would have a negative taxable income of $1,400 and thus would be entitled to a $700 payment from the Government.

Modifications of the Negative Income Tax—Another negative income tax plan has been proposed by Robert Lampman, University of Wisconsin economist. Lampman would use the poverty line (currently set at $3,300) as the break-even level for a four-member family instead of income tax exemptions and minimum standard deductions. But he also recommended a 50 percent rate to compute the Government payment.

A more generous version of the Friedman plan has been advanced by Yale University professor James Tobin. Under the Tobin plan, the break-even point could go as high as $7,500, with a minimum guaranteed floor of $2,500.

Tobin has estimated that an adequate income maintenance program, that would replace most public assistance expenditures, might cost as much as $25 billion a year.

Presidential commission's also have recommended doing away with existing welfare programs in favor of some kind of guaranteed income system.

In 1966, the National Commission on Technology, Automation, and Economic Progress recommended that Congress give "serious study to a minimum income allowance or negative income tax program...to approach by stages the goal of eliminating the need for means test public assistance programs by providing a floor of adequate incomes."

The Kerner Commission in 1968 proposed that the Federal Government provide a minimum guaranteed income to families enrolled in the AFDC program. The

Negative Income Tax Experiment

A test of the negative income tax began in Trenton, N.J., in October 1968.

The U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), which is sponsoring the experiment, calls it "graduated work incentives" rather than "negative income tax" because of what it calls the "desired work-inducing effects of the program" or the reduction of payments gradually as other income increases.

The project was extended to two other New Jersey cities early in 1969 and will be tried in rural areas later this year.

Two groups of families have been used—about 800 families in one group who have been receiving graduated work incentive payments and about 400 families in the other group who are receiving no payments. Seven separate payment schedules have been established, with each arrangement guaranteeing a different maximum grant based on income and family size. The grants range from $1,000 to $4,600 a year, with the levels reduced by 33 percent to 75 percent as other income increases.

One variation, for example, provides a 50 percent deduction for earned income and a 75 percent guaranteed income rate applied to the remainder after the 50 percent deduction. Using a break-even point of $3,300 annual income, a family earning $3,000 would lose $1,500 in benefits but still receive $975 (or 75 percent of the $1,500) for a net annual income of $3,975.

The families receiving the payments may spend the money any way they wish and may move from the city and still receive the payments. Their only requirement is filing a monthly report on earnings and number of dependents.

Responsibility for running the experiment has been assigned by the OEO to the Institute for Research on Poverty at the University of Wisconsin. The institute in turn has contracted with Mathematica, a group of Princeton University professors, to handle much of the project's administration. Another group set up by the institute—the Council for Grants to Families—works with the project participants and helps them with their problems.

The program is to run for three years and will cost about $5 million. By the end of the three years, the OEO hopes to have learned what changes the income payments have made in the lives of the participants—whether they made greater or fewer efforts to find work and seek promotion, whether the families showed greater stability after receiving the payments and to what uses the extra money was put.

Commission also called for uniform national welfare standards, extension of the AFDC program and absorption of most of the costs of welfare by the Federal Government.

Recent Developments

The welfare laws which originated during the Depression have been amended from time to time by Congress mainly to increase the federal share of benefits. But major federal reforms, apart from the addition of the medical assistance program for the needy, have not been made for many years.

States which have been faced with rapidly accelerating welfare costs have, however, in the last year or two tried adopting regulations designed to cut costs. Congress also has attempted to encourage greater work training by welfare recipients to reduce participation in the programs.

Some of the recent developments involving the welfare system:

Congress. In 1967, Congress sought to tighten the administration and costs of the AFDC program and to encourage working by AFDC mothers. As part of the Social Security Amendments of 1967 (PL 90-248), Congress provided work training and work-incentive programs for AFDC mothers and day-care facilities for their children.

Congress also placed a freeze on the number of AFDC participants for whom the Federal Government would share welfare costs with the states. The ceiling was set at the ratio of AFDC children to the total number of children in the state as of January 1968. States and localities would have been forced to assume the total costs of assistance to all needy children in excess of the freeze. The limitation was intended to prod the states into rapidly using the work-incentive features of the bill.

After postponing the freeze in 1968 for one year, Congress June 30 repealed it entirely. State and local governments argued that they could not afford the increased costs they would have incurred because of the freeze. (Weekly Report p. 1204)

The Courts. The Supreme Court ruled April 21 that one-year residency requirements as a basis for welfare eligibility were unconstitutional. The decision, based on three cases from Connecticut, Pennsylvania and the District of Columbia, struck down residency requirements in 40 states.

Secretary Robert H. Finch of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) said the decision made minimum federal standards for welfare inevitable. The Department of HEW estimated that 100,000 to 200,000 AFDC recipients might be added to the rolls as a result of the ruling. (Weekly Report p. 593)

The Supreme Court on June 17, 1968, invalidated an Alabama regulation that families were ineligible for relief under the AFDC program if an able-bodied man resided in the home, whether or not he was the parent of the children in the home. The state considered the man a "substitute" parent. (1968 Almanac p. 149)

HEW in October issued a regulation which stated that "substitute parent" or "man-in-the-house" criteria could not be used by states to disqualify families from assistance.

Federal Agencies. The HEW Department in 1968 ruled that beginning July 1, 1969, persons seeking welfare benefits would be permitted to draw welfare checks without undergoing investigations of eligibility.

The new regulations were to apply only to certain areas for a trial run.

If the Administration decides to go ahead with this approach, the new system will go into effect nationwide on Oct. 1, 1969, for Old-Age Assistance; Jan. 1, 1970, for Aid to the Blind and Disabled; and April 1, 1970, for AFDC.

NIXON PROPOSES $4 BILLION REVAMP OF WELFARE SYSTEM

President Nixon Aug. 8 proposed an ambitious new domestic program to reform the welfare system, to institute revenue sharing with state and local government and to streamline manpower training programs.

Calling the program The "New Federalism," the President said it would offer "a new and drastically different approach to the way in which government cares for those in need, and to the way the responsibilities are shared between the State and Federal Governments." (For text of speech, see p. 1517.)

The major component of the program was a $4 billion welfare system which would set a minimum annual federal payment of $1,600 for needy families. The plan was to cover the "working poor" as well as those with no income and require unemployed adult recipients to obtain job training or employment to receive benefits.

The aim of the program, the President said, was to bring those able to work off welfare rolls and onto payrolls.

The President also proposed turning over to state and local governments the administration of federal job training programs and returning to those governments $500 million in fiscal 1971 as a revenue-sharing measure.

The fourth part of the President's speech dealt with a reorganization of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) which the President said had suffered from "a confusion of roles." In the future, the President said, the OEO would be a "laboratory agency" to test new ideas for eliminating poverty.

Reaction to Proposals

Republican Members of Congress and local government officials generally praised the President's program but some skepticism was voiced about the program's chances for passage by Congress. Liberals and welfare groups complained that the proposed welfare benefits were too low.

Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D Ark.) of the House Ways and Means Committee which would have to approve the recommendations, said he was reserving final judgment on revenue-sharing until he examined the specific formula for disbursing the funds.

"If it is just a block grant with no formula (for ensuring Congressional objectives), I think it is a very bad thing," Mills said. "There would be no restraint on the state legislatures," he continued.

Mills also said he approved of the general concept of the President's welfare plan and hoped to hold early hearings on the proposals. He was concerned about the $4 billion cost, he said, but endorsed the President's program for training the poor for employment.

New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) both praised the plan for providing "needed new concepts for reforming our national welfare system," and criticized it for not giving "significant financial relief to New York or other industrialized states which now bear the heaviest fiscal burden for public assistance."

But two other Republican Governors were less reserved in their enthusiasm for the plan. Minnesota Gov. Harold E. LeVander called the welfare and revenue-sharing proposals "a major breakthrough in federal-state relations" while Washington Gov. Daniel J. Evans said the recommendations could have a more dramatic impact on state and local government "than any federal fiscal action ever taken."

Spokesmen for welfare and civil rights organizations termed the proposed welfare benefits inadequate to meet the needs of the poor, but also said the speech indicated recognition of the enormity of the welfare problem.

Whitney Young Jr., executive director of the National Urban League, said the speech was "the first recognition that welfare is a national problem, demanding income guarantees by the federal government." George A. Wiley, executive director of the National Welfare Rights Organization, said the proposals would not solve the welfare crisis or the crisis of the cities.

The President sent messages to Congress on the following dates: Aug. 11, welfare (Text p. 1520); Aug. 12, manpower (Text p. 1523); and Aug. 13, revenue-sharing (Txxt p. 1525). The OEO reorganization plan (Text p. 1526) did not require Congressional approval.

Welfare Message

President Nixon's welfare message proposed two major changes in the existing welfare structure:

- Federal benefits for "working poor" families—those whose income falls below $3,920 for a family of four.
- A national minimum benefit of $1,600 annually for a family of four with no income. Blind, elderly and disabled persons would be assured of a minimum federal monthly payment of $65.

States in which payments presently exceeded the proposed $1,600, the President said, would be required to supplement the federal benefit so that payments did not fall below their current level. No state would be required, Mr. Nixon said, to spend more than 90 percent of its present welfare cost.

Mr. Nixon also recommended that only low-income families without children and needy single persons be eligible for food stamps under the new system.

Office Of Economic Opportunity

President Nixon proposed a reorganization of the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) aimed at turning the agency into an innovator of experimental programs to take people out of poverty.

He said the agency's functions would be handled by three main offices: the Office of Planning, Research, and Evaluation; Office of Program Development and Office of Program Operations.

Programs

Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) Aid to the Blind (AB), Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled (APTD) and Old-Age Assistance (OAA)

AFDC to be replaced by Family Assistance program. AB, APTD and OAA to be continued.

Eligible Recipients

AFDC—Dependent children in families in which the male of the household is incapacitated, dead or absent, and (in 25 states) where the male head of the household is unemployed. The mothers of the dependent children are also eligible for AFDC payments.

AB, APTD and OAA—Recipients include the blind, the disabled and the needy elderly.

Family Assistance—All families with children whose incomes are under a certain level ($3,920 for a family of four; $5,700 for a family of seven). Two types of families would be covered: "dependent families" headed by a female or unemployed father, and "working poor" families headed by an employed male whose earnings were below $3,920. To be eligible for benefits, unemployed fathers and mothers of school-age children would be required to accept job training or employment.

AB, APTD and OAA—Eligibility unchanged. Recipients include the blind, disabled and needy elderly.

Total Number of Recipients

Welfare recipients with earnings: First $30 earned a month and one-third of remainder not deducted from welfare check. Remaining two-thirds of earned income deducted.

Family Assistance

1) Families with no earnings:

a. A federal payment of $1,600 a year—$500 for first two family members and $300 for each additional family members.

b. Supplemental state funds.

2) Families with earnings:

a. $1,600-a-year federal benefit, reduced by 50 percent of earnings on money earned above $750 a year. Example: Family of four with earnings of $2,000.

Subtract $720 from $2,000 -	$1,280
50 percent of $1,280 -	640
Subtract $640 from $1,600 -	960
Add $940 to $2000 earned income -	$2,960

AB, APTD, OAA—Federal minimum payment level of $65 a month per recipient, plus state supplementation.

Federal-State Cost Sharing

AFDC—Federal share: five-sixths of first $18 for each recipient; 50 to 65 percent of balance depending on state per capita income. Maximum federal share—$32 a month per recipient. Each state determines its own cost share.

AB, APTD, OAA—Federal share: $31 of first $37; 50 to 65 percent of balance depending on state per capita income. Maximum federal share - $75 a month per recipient. Each state determines its own cost share.

Family Assistance—Federal share: $1,600 annually for family of four.

State share: States must make up difference between federal $1,600 and state's present benefit level. No state can contribute less than 50 percent of its present total gross costs; no state required to contribute more than 90 percent of its present level.

AB, APTD, OAA—Federal share: 100 percent of first $50, 50 percent of next $15 and 25 percent of remainder. Federal minimum payment per recipient of $65 a month.

Total Federal Costs

(Fiscal 1968)

AFDC	$1.40	billion
AB	.05
APTD	.38
OAA	1.2
Total	$3.0	billion

Estimate, fiscal 1970: $4.2 billion

Additional costs, Family Assistance	$2.5	billion
Additional costs, Adult programs	.4
Training and day care	.6
Other costs including administration	.5
Total additional federal costs	- $4.0	billion
	+ 4.2	fiscal 1970
Total	$8.2	billion

Administration

All welfare programs administered by state and local governments which determine eligibility and size of payments to recipients.

Family Assistance program to be administered by Social Security Administration. AB, APTD and OAA to be combined.

Work Training

AFDC—Under 1967 amendments to Social Security Act, mothers in AFDC program were to seek work training. The legislation provided that an attempt be made to find jobs for those who were employable and that those in need of training be trained and given $30 a month incentive payment. Those who refused to accept work or undertake training were to lose their welfare benefits. The legislation also provided 80 percent federal matching for the cost of the work training program and day care centers for preschool children of mothers in training or on jobs. The states were to participate in the program and determine those required to take training.

1) Employable recipients (able-bodied unemployed fathers and mothers of school-age children) in Family Assistance programs required to accept training or employment or lose their portion of family benefits.

2) 150,000 additional training opportunities for welfare mothers.

3) Child care services for additional 450,000 children in families headed by welfare mothers who seek training or employment.

4) $30 monthly benefit for trainees.

TEXT OF PRESIDENT'S WELFARE-'WORKFARE' SPEECH

Following is the complete text of President Nixon's Aug. 8 speech on public welfare and other reforms. (See story, p. 1477)

As you know, I returned last Sunday night from a trip around the world—a trip that took me to eight countries in nine days.

The purpose of this trip was to help lay the basis for a lasting peace, once the war in Vietnam is ended. In the course of it, I also saw once again the vigorous efforts so many new nations are making to leap the centuries into the modern world.

Here in the United States, we are more fortunate. We have the world's most advanced industrial economy, the greatest wealth ever known to man and the fullest measure of freedom ever enjoyed by any people anywhere.

Yet we, too, have an urgent need to modernize our institutions—and our need is no less than theirs.

We face an urban crisis, a social crisis—and at the same time, a crisis of confidence in the capacity of government to do its job.

A third of a century of centralizing power and responsibility in Washington has produced a bureaucratic monstrosity, cumbersome, unresponsive and ineffective.

A third of a century of social experiment has left us a legacy of entrenched programs that have outlived their time or outgrown their purposes.

A third of a century of unprecendented growth and change has strained our institutions and raised serious questions about whether they are still adequate to the times.

It is no accident, therefore, that we find increasing skepticism—and not only among the young, but among citizens everywhere—about the continuing capacity of government to master the challenges we face.

Nowhere has the failure of government been more tragically apparent than in its efforts to help the poor, and especially in its system of public welfare.

Target: Reform

Since taking office, one of my first priorities has been to repair the machinery of government and put it in shape for the 1970s. I have made many changes designed to improve the functioning of the Executive Branch. I have asked Congress for a number of important structural reforms: among others, a wide-ranging postal reform, a comprehensive draft reform, a reform of the unemployment insurance and antihunger programs and reform of the present confusing hodge-podge of federal grants-in-aid. Last April 21 I sent Congress a message asking for a package of major tax reforms, including both the closing of loopholes and the removal of more than 2 million low-income tax-paying families from the tax rolls entirely. I am glad Congress is acting now on tax reform; I hope it acts soon on the other reforms as well.

The purpose of all these reforms is to eliminate unfairness; to make government more effective as well as more efficient; and to bring an end to its chronic failure to deliver the service that it promises.

My purpose tonight, however, is not to review the past record, but to present a new set of reforms—a new set of proposals—a new and drastically different approach to the way in which government cares for those in need, and to the way the responsibilities are shared between the state and federal governments.

I have chosen to do so in a direct report to the people because these proposals call for public decisions of the first importance; because they represent a fundamental change in the nation's approach to one of its most pressing social problems; and because, quite deliberately, they also represent the first major reversal of the trend toward ever more centralization of government in Washington. After a third of a century of power flowing from the people and the states to Washington, it is time for a New Federalism in which power, funds and responsibility will flow from Washington to the states and to the people.

During last year's election campaign, I often made a point that touched a responsive chord wherever I traveled.

I said that this nation became great, not because of what government did for people, but because of what people did for themselves.

It aims at getting everyone able to work off welfare rolls and onto payrolls.

It aims at ending the unfairness in a system that has become unfair to the welfare recipient, unfair to the working poor and unfair to the taxpayer.

This new approach aims to make it possible for people—wherever in America they live—to receive their fair share of opportunity. It aims to ensure that people receiving aid, and who are able to work, contribute their fair share of productivity.

This new approach is embodied in a package of four measures: first, a complete replacement of the present welfare system; second, a comprehensive new job training and placement program; third, a revamping of the Office of Economic Opportunity; and fourth, a start on the sharing of the federal tax revenues with the states.

Next week—in three messages to the Congress and one statement—I will spell out in detail what these measures contain. Tonight I want to explain what they mean, what they are intended to achieve and how they are related.

Welfare

Whether measured by the anguish of the poor themselves or by the drastically mounting burden on the taxpayer, the present welfare system has to be judged a colossal failure.

Our states and cities find themselves sinking in a welfare quagmire as caseloads increase, as costs escalate and as the welfare system stagnates enterprise and perpetuates dependency. What began on a small scale in the depression 30s has become a monster in the prosperous 60s. The tragedy is not only that it is bringing states and cities to the brink of financial disaster, but also that it is failing to meet the elementary human, social and financial needs of the poor.

It breaks up homes. It often penalizes work. It robs recipients of dignity. And it grows.

Benefit levels are grossly unequal—for a mother with three children, they range from an average of $263 a month in one state down to an average of $39 in another state. So great an inequality is wrong; no child is "worth" more in one state than in another. One result of this inequality is to lure thousands more into already overcrowded inner cities, as unprepared for city life as they are for city jobs.

The present system creates an incentive for desertion. In most states, a family is denied welfare payments if a father is present—even though he is unable to support his family. In practice, this is what often happens: a father is unable to find a job at all, or one that will support his children. To make the children eligible for welfare, he leaves home—and the children are denied the authority, the discipline and the love that come with having a father in the house. This is wrong.

The present system often makes it possible to receive more money on welfare than on a low-paying job. This creates an incentive not to work; it also is unfair to the working poor. It is morally wrong for a family that is working to try to make ends meet to receive less than the family across the street on welfare. This has been bitterly resented by the man who works, and rightly so—the rewards are just the opposite of what they should be. Its effect is to draw people off payrolls and onto welfare rolls—just the opposite of what government should be doing. To put it bluntly and simply—any system which makes it more profitable for a man not to work than to work, and which encourages a man to desert his family rather than stay with his family, is wrong and indefensible.

We cannot simply ignore the failures of welfare or expect them to go away. In the past eight years, 3 million more people have been added to the welfare rolls—all in a period of low unemployment. If the present trend continues, another 4 million will have joined the welfare rolls by 1975. The financial cost will be crushing; the human cost will be suffocating.

I propose that we abolish the present welfare system and adopt in its place a new family assistance system. Initially, this new system would cost more than welfare. But unlike welfare, it is designed to correct the condition it deals with and thus to lessen the long-range burden.

Under this plan, the so-called "adult categories" of aid—aid to the aged, the blind and disabled—would be continued and a national minimum standard for benefits would be set, with the Federal Government contributing to its cost and also sharing the cost of additional state payments above that amount.

But the program now called "Aid to Families with Dependent Children"—the program we normally think of when we think of "welfare"—would be done away with completely. The new family assistance system I propose in its place rests essentially on three principles: equality of treatment, a work requirement and a work incentive.

Its benefits would go to the working poor as well as the nonworking; to families with dependent children headed by a father as well as to those headed by a mother; and a basic federal minimum would be provided, the same in every state.

I propose that the Federal Government build a foundation under the income of every American family with dependent children that cannot care for itself—wherever in America that family may live.

For a family of four now on welfare, with no outside income, the basic federal payment would be $1,600 a year. States could add to that amount, and most would do so. In no case would anyone's present level of benefits be lowered. At the same time, this foundation would be one on which the family itself could build. Outside earnings would be encouraged, not discouraged. The new worker could keep the first $60 a month of outside earnings with no reduction in his benefits, and beyond that his benefits would be reduced by only 50 cents for each dollar earned.

By the same token, a family head already employed at low wages could get a family assistance supplement; those who work would no longer be discriminated against. A family of five in which the father earns $2,000 a year—which is the hard fact of life for many families—would get family assistance payments of $1,260 for a total income of $3,260. A family of seven earning $3,000 a year would have its income raised to $4,360.

Thus, for the first time, the government would recognize that it has no less of an obligation to the working poor than to the nonworking poor; and for the first time, benefits would be scaled in such a way that it would always pay to work.

With such incentives, most recipients who can work will want to work. This is part of the American character.

But what of the others—those who can work but choose not to?

The answer is very simple.

Under this proposal, everyone who accepts benefits must also accept work or training provided suitable jobs are available, either locally or at some distance if transportation is provided. The only exceptions would be those unable to work and mothers of preschool children. Even mothers of preschool children, however, would have the opportunity to work—because I am also proposing along with this a major expansion of day-care centers to make it possible for mothers to take jobs by which they can support themselves and their children.

This national floor under incomes for working or dependent families is not a "guaranteed income." Under the guaranteed income proposal, everyone would be assured a minimum income, regardless of how much he was capable of earning, regardless of what his need was, regardless of whether or not he was willing to work.

During the Presidential campaign last year I opposed such a plan. I oppose it now and will continue to oppose it. A guaranteed income would undermine the incentive to work; the family assistance plan increases the incentive to work. A guaranteed income establishes a right without responsibilities; family assistance recognizes a need and establishes a responsibility. It provides help to those in need and in turn requires that those who receive help work to the extent of their capabilities. There is no reason why one person should be taxed so that another can choose to live idly.

In states that now have benefit levels above the federal floor, family assistance would help ease the states' financial burdens. But in 20 states—those in which poverty is most widespread—the new federal floor would be above present average benefit levels and would mean a leap upward for many thousands of families that cannot care for themselves.

Manpower Training

Next, let me turn to the job training proposals that are part of our full opportunity concept. America prides itself on being the "land of opportunity." I deeply believe in this ideal.

Full opportunity means the chance for upward mobility on every rung of the economic ladder—and for every American, no matter what his handicaps of birth.

The cold, hard truth is that a child born to a poor family has far less chance to make a good living than a child born to a middle-income family.

He is born poor, fed poorly; and if his family is on welfare, he starts life in an atmosphere of handout and dependency; often he receives little preparation for work and less inspiration. The wonder of the American character is that so many have the spark and drive to fight their way up. But for millions of others, the burden of poverty in early life stifles that spark.

The new family assistance would provide aid for needy families; it would establish a work requirement and a work incentive; but these in turn require effective programs of job training and job placement—including a chance to qualify, not just for any jobs, but for good jobs that provide both additional self-respect and full self-support.

Therefore, I am also sending a message to Congress calling for a complete overhaul of the nation's manpower training services.

The Federal Government's job training programs have been a terrible tangle of confusion and waste. They are overcentralized, over-categorized; with good reason, many young people wonder why the Federal Government cannot take money out of one program that has too few applicants and use it instead to expand another that has too many. They wonder why they have to accept training programs they have no interest in instead of ones they care about. They want to be treated as human beings, not cogs in a machine.

To remedy the confusion, arbitrariness and rigidity of the present system, the new Manpower Training Act would basically do three things:

- It would pull together the jumble of programs that currently exist and equalize standards of eligibility.
- It would provide flexible funding—so that federal money would follow the demands of labor and industry and flow into those programs that people most want and need.
- It would decentralize administration, gradually moving it away from the Washington bureaucracy and turning it over to states and localities.

COPYRIGHT 1969 CONGRESSIONAL QUARTERLY INC.
Reproduction prohibited in whole or in part except by editorial clients

In terms of its symbolic importance, I can hardly overemphasize this last point. For the first time, applying the principles of the New Federalism, administration of a major established federal program would be turned over to the states and local governments, recognizing that they are in a position to do the job better.

For years, thoughtful Americans have talked of the need to decentralize government. The time has come to begin.

Federal job training programs have grown to vast proportions, costing more than a billion dollars a year. Yet they are essentially local in character. As long as the Federal Government continues to bear the cost, they can perfectly well be run by states and localities—and that way they can better be adapted to specific state and local needs.

What I propose is not a sudden dumping of these programs on unprepared local authorities, but rather a careful, phased transfer, with benchmarks of readiness and incentives for performance. If states and localities decline to pick up the responsibility, the Federal Government will continue to manage the programs. If they try and fail, the Federal Government can resume the responsibility. We should trust the American capacity for self-government enough to try. The only way to bring about decentralization is to do it, and this is the place to begin.

The Manpower Training Act will have other provisions specifically designed to help move people off welfare rolls and onto payrolls:

- A computerized job bank would be established, to match jobseekers with job vacancies.
- For those on welfare, a $30-a-month bonus would be offered as an incentive to go into job training.
- For heads of families now on welfare, 150,000 new training slots would be opened.
- As I mentioned previously, greatly expanded day-care center facilities would be provided for the children of welfare mothers who choose to work. However, these would be day-care centers with a difference. There is no single ideal to which this Administration is more firmly committed than to the enriching of a child's first five years of life, and thus helping lift the poor out of misery at a time when a lift can help the most. Therefore, these day-care centers would offer more than custodial care; they would also be devoted to the development of vigorous young minds and bodies. As a further dividend, the day-care centers would offer employment to many welfare mothers themselves.

Office Of Economic Opportunity

One common theme running through my proposals tonight is that of providing full opportunity for every American. A second theme is that of trying to equip every American to play a productive role. A third is the need to make government itself workable—which means reshaping, reforming, innovating.

The Office of Economic Opportunity is an innovative agency—and thus it has a vital place in our efforts to develop new programs and apply new knowledge. But in order to do effectively what it can do best, OEO itself needs reorganization.

In the past, OEO suffered from a confusion of roles and from a massive attempt to do everything at once, with the same people performing many conflicting functions: coordinating old programs, doing new research, setting up demonstration projects, evaluating results and serving as advocates for the poor. As a result, inefficiency, waste and resentment too often clouded the record of even its best accomplishments.

This Administration has made a thorough study of OEO. We have assigned it a leading role in the effort to develop and test new approaches to the solving of social problems. OEO is to be a laboratory agency, where new ideas for helping people are tried on a pilot basis. When these prove successful, they can be "spun off" to operating departments or agencies—just as the agency, for example, "spun off" the weather satellite and the communications satellite when these proved successful. Then OEO will be free to concentrate on breaking even newer ground.

OEO has a broad charter: not only to help make opportunity real but to search out ways of making institutions more responsive and to get behind the effects of poverty to the causes of poverty. These goals are fundamental commitments of this Administration.

The OEO reorganization to be announced next week will stress its innovative role. It also will stress accountability, a clear separation of functions and a tighter, more effective organization of field operations.

Revenue Sharing

We come now to a proposal which I consider profoundly important to the future of our federal system of shared responsibilities. As we look ahead to the 1970s and the 1980s, it also is vital in terms of ensuring that states and localities can continue to do their part in dealing with the kinds of social problems I have been discussing tonight.

When we speak of poverty or jobs or opportunity, or making government more effective or getting it closer to the people, it brings us directly to the financial plight of our states and cities.

We can no longer have effective government on any level unless we have it on all levels. There is too much to be done for the cities to do it alone or for the states to do it alone—or for Washington to do it alone.

For a third of a century, power and responsibility have flowed toward Washington—and Washington has taken for its own the best sources of revenue.

We intend to reverse this tide, and to turn back to the states a greater measure of responsibility—not as a way of avoiding problems but as a better way of solving problems. Along with this should go a share of federal revenues. I shall propose to the Congress next week that a set portion of the revenues from federal income taxes be remitted directly to the states—with a minimum of federal restrictions on how those dollars are to be used and with a requirement that a percentage of them be channeled through for the use of local governments.

The funds provided under this program will not be great in the first year. But the principle will have been established, and the amounts will increase as our budgetary situation improves.

As we look ahead to the complex tasks of the 70s; as we contemplate the diversity of this vast and varied country, it is clear beyond question that effective, responsive government will require not one center of power, but many. This start on revenue sharing is a step toward the New Federalism. It is a gesture of faith in America's states and localties and in the principles of democratic self-government.

With this revenue-sharing proposal, we follow through on a commitment I made in the last campaign; we follow through on a mandate which the electorate gave us last November—after nearly 40 years of moving power from the states to Washington, we begin in America a decade of decentralization, a shifting of power away from the center whenever it can be used better locally.

In recent years, we all have concentrated a great deal of attention on what we commonly call the "crisis of the cities." These proposals I have made are addressed in part to that, but they also are focused much more broadly.

They are addressed to the crisis of government—to adapting its structures and making it manageable.

They are addressed to the crisis of poverty and need—which is rural as well as urban. This Administration is committed to full opportunity on the farm as well as in the city; to a better life for rural America; to ensuring that government is responsive to the needs of rural America. These proposals will advance those goals.

I have discussed these four matters together, because together they make both a package and a pattern. They should be studied together, debated together, seen in perspective.

These proposals will be controversial. They also are expensive. Let us face that fact frankly and directly.

The first-year costs of the new family assistance program, including the child care centers and job training, would be $4 billion. I deliberated long and hard over whether we could afford such an outlay. I decided in favor of it for two reasons: because the costs would not begin until fiscal 1971, when I expect the funds to be available; and because I concluded that this is a reform we cannot afford not to undertake. The cost of continuing the present system, in financial as well as human terms, is staggering if projected into the 1970s.

Revenue sharing would begin in the middle of fiscal 1971, at a half-year cost of a half billion dollars. This cuts into the federal budget, but it represents relief for the equally hard-pressed states. It would help curb the rise in state and local taxes.

Over-all, we would be spending more—in the short run—to help people who now are poor and who now are unready for work or unable to find work.

I see it this way: Every businessman and every working man knows what "start-up costs" are. They are a heavy investment made in early years in the expectation that they will more than pay for themselves in future years.

The investment in these proposals is a human investment; it also is a "start-up cost" in turning around our dangerous decline into welfarism. We cannot produce productive people with the antiquated, wheezing, over-loaded machine we now call the welfare system.

If we fail to make this investment in work incentives now, if we merely try to patch up the system here and there, we will only be pouring good money after bad in ever-increasing amounts.

If we do invest in this modernization, the heavily burdened taxpayer at least will see the light at the end of the tunnel. And the man who now looks ahead only to a lifetime of dependency will see hope for a life of work and pride and dignity.

In the final analysis, we cannot talk our way out of poverty; we cannot legislate our way out of poverty; but this nation can work its way out of poverty. What America needs now is not more welfare but more "workfare."

The task of this government, the great task of our people, is to provide the training for work, the incentive to work, the opportunity to work and the reward for work. Together, these measures are a first long step in that direction.

For those in the welfare system today, or struggling to fight their way out of poverty, these measures offer a way to independence through the dignity of work.

For those able to work, these measures provide new opportunities to learn work and to find work.

For the working poor—the forgotten poor—these measures offer a fair share in the assistance given to the poor.

The new system establishes a direct link between the government's willingness to help the needy and the willingness of the needy to help themselves.

It removes the present incentive not to work and substitutes an incentive to work; it removes the present incentive for families to break apart and substitutes an incentive for families to stay together.

It removes blatant inequities, injustices and indignities of the welfare system.

It establishes a basic federal floor so that children in any state can have at least the minimum essentials of life.

Together, these measures cushion the impact of welfare costs on states and localities, many of which have found themselves in fiscal crisis as costs have spiraled.

They bring reason, order and purpose into a tangle of overlapping programs and show that government can be made to work.

Poverty will not be defeated by a stroke of a pen signing a check; it will not be reduced to nothing overnight with slogans or ringing exhortations.

Poverty is not only a state of income. It is also a state of mind and a state of health. Poverty must be conquered without sacrificing the will to work, for if we take the route of the permanent handout, the American character will itself be impoverished.

In my recent trip around the world, I visited countries in all stages of economic development; countries with different social systems, different economic systems, different political systems.

In all of them, however, I found that one event had caught their imagination and lifted their spirits almost beyond measure: The trip of Apollo to the moon and back. On that historic day when the astronauts set foot on the moon, the spirit of Apollo II truly swept the world—a spirit of peace and brotherhood and adventure and a spirit that thrilled to the knowledge that man had dreamed the impossible, dared the impossible and done the impossible.

Abolishing poverty, putting an end to dependency—like reaching for the moon a generation ago, that may be impossible. But in the spirit of Apollo, we can lift our sights and marshal our best efforts. We can resolve to make this the year, not that we reached the goal, but that we turned the corner: From a dismal cycle of dependency toward a new birth of independence; from despair toward hope; from an ominously mounting impotence of government toward a new effectiveness of government—and toward a full opportunity for every American to share the bounty of this rich land.

WELFARE REFORM MESSAGE

Following is the complete text of President Nixon's Aug. 11 welfare reform message to Congress. (For story, see p. 1477)

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

A measure of the greatness of a powerful nation is the character of the life it creates for those who are powerless to make ends meet.

If we do not find the way to become a working nation that properly cares for the dependent, we shall become a welfare state that undermines the incentive of the working man.

The present welfare system has failed us—it has fostered family breakup, has provided very little help in many states and has even deepened dependency by all too often making it more attractive to go on welfare than to go to work.

I propose a new approach that will make it more attractive to go to work than to go on welfare, and will establish a nationwide minimum payment to dependent families with children.

I propose that the Federal Government pay a basic income to those American families who cannot care for themselves in whichever state they live.

I propose that dependent families receiving such income be given good reason to go to work by making the first 60 dollars a month they earn completely their own, with no deductions from their benefits.

I propose that we make available an addition to the incomes of the "working poor," to encourage them to go on working and to eliminate the possibility of making more from welfare than from wages.

I propose that these payments be made upon certification of income, with demeaning and costly investigations replaced by simplified reviews and spot checks and with no eligibility requirement that the household be without a father. That present requirement in many states has the effect of breaking up families and contributes to delinquency and violence.

I propose that all employable persons who choose to accept these payments be required to register for work or job training and be required to accept that work or training, provided suitable jobs are available either locally or if transportation is provided. Adequate and convenient day care would be provided children wherever necessary to enable a parent to train or work. The only exception to this work requirement would be mothers of preschool children.

I propose a major expansion of job-training and day-care facilities, so that current welfare recipients able to work can be set on the road to self-reliance.

I propose that we also provide uniform federal payment minimums for the present three categories of welfare aid to adults—the aged, the blind and the disabled.

This would be total welfare reform—the transformation of a system frozen in failure and frustration into a system that would work and would encourage people to work.

Accordingly, we have stopped considering human welfare in isolation. The new plan is part of an over-all approach which includes a comprehensive new Manpower Training Act and a plan for a system of revenue sharing with the states to help provide all of them with necessary budget relief. Messages on manpower training and revenue sharing will follow this message tomorrow and the next day, and the three should be considered as parts of a whole approach to what is clearly a national problem.

Need for New Departures. A welfare system is a success when it takes care of people who cannot take care of themselves and when it helps employable people climb toward independence.

A welfare system is a failure when it takes care of those who can take care of themselves, when it drastically varies payments in different areas, when it breaks up families, when it perpetuates a vicious cycle of dependency, when it strips human beings of their dignity.

America's welfare system is a failure that grows worse every day.

First, it fails the recipient: In many areas, benefits are so low that we have hardly begun to take care of the dependent. And there has been no light at the end of poverty's tunnel. After four years of inflation, the poor have generally become poorer.

Second, it fails the taxpayer: Since 1960, welfare costs have doubled and the number on the rolls has risen from 5.8 million to over 9 million, all in a time when unemployment was low. The taxpayer is entitled to expect government to devise a system that will help people lift themselves out of poverty.

Finally, it fails American society: By breaking up homes, the present welfare system has added to social unrest and robbed millions of children of the joy of childhood; by widely varying payments among regions, it has helped to draw millions into the slums of our cities.

The situation has become intolerable. Let us examine the alternatives available:

- We could permit the welfare momentum to continue to gather speed by our inertia; by 1975 this would result in 4 million more Americans on welfare rolls at a cost of close to $11 billion a year, with both recipients and taxpayers shortchanged.
- We could tinker with the system as it is, adding to the patchwork of modifications and exceptions. That has been the approach of the past, and it has failed.
- We could adopt a "guaranteed minimum income for everyone," which would appear to wipe out poverty overnight. It would also wipe out the basic economic motivation for work and place an enormous strain on the industrious to pay for the leisure of the lazy.
- Or we could adopt a totally new approach to welfare, designed to assist those left far behind the national norm and provide all with the motivation to work and a fair share of the opportunity to train.

This Administration, after a careful analysis of all the alternatives, is committed to a new departure that will find a solution for the welfare problem. The time for denouncing the old is over; the time for devising the new is now.

Recognizing the Practicalities. People usually follow their self-interest.

This stark fact is distressing to many social planners who like to look at problems from the top down. Let us abandon the ivory tower and consider the real world in all we do.

In most states, welfare is provided only when there is no father at home to provide support. If a man's children would be better off on welfare than with the low wage he is able to bring home, wouldn't he be tempted to leave home?

If a person spent a great deal of time and effort to get on the welfare rolls, wouldn't he think twice about risking his eligibility by taking a job that might not last long?

In each case, welfare policy was intended to limit the spread of dependency; in practice, however, the effect has been to increase dependency and remove the incentive to work.

We fully expect people to follow their self-interest in their business dealings; why should we be surprised when people follow their self-interest in their welfare dealings? That is why we propose a plan in which it is in the interest of every employable person to do his fair share of work.

The Operation of the New Approach. We would assure an income foundation throughout every section of America for all parents who cannot adequately support themselves and their children. For a family of four with less than $1,000 income, this payment would be $1,600 a year; for a family of four with $2,000 income, this payment would supplement that income by $960 a year.

Under the present welfare system, each state provides "Aid to Families with Dependent Children," a program we propose to replace. The Federal Government shares the cost, but each state establishes key eligibility rules and determines how much income support will be provided to poor families. The result has been an uneven and unequal system. The 1969 benefits average for a family of four is $171 a month across the nation, but individual state averages range from $263 down to $39 a month.

A new federal minimum of $1,600 a year cannot claim to provide comfort to a family of four, but the present low of $468 a year cannot claim to provide even the basic necessities.

The new system would do away with the inequity of very low benefit levels in some states, and of state-by-state variations in eligibility tests, by establishing a federally financed income floor with a national definition of basic eligibility.

States will continue to carry an important responsibility. In 30 states the federal basic payment will be less than the present levels of combined federal and state payments. These states will be required to maintain the current level of benefits, but in no case will a state be required to spend more than 90 percent of its present welfare cost. The Federal Government will not only provide the "floor," but it will assume 10 percent of the benefits now being paid by the states as their part of welfare costs.

In 20 states, the new payment would exceed the present average benefit payments, in some cases by a wide margin. In these states, where benefits are lowest and poverty often the most severe, the payments will raise benefit levels substantially. For five years, every state will be required to continue to spend at least half of what they are now spending on welfare, to supplement the federal base.

For the typical "welfare family"—a mother with dependent children and no outside income—the new system would provide a basic national minimum payment. A mother with three small children would be assured an annual income of at least $1,600.

For the family headed by an employed father or working mother, the same basic benefits would be received, but $60 per month of earnings would be "disregarded" in order to make up the costs of working and provide a strong advantage in holding a job. The wage-earner could also keep 50 percent of his benefits as his earnings rise above that $60 per month. A family of four, in which the father earns $2,000 in a year, would receive payments of $960, for a total income of $2,960.

For the aged, the blind and the disabled, the present system varies benefit levels from $40 per month for an aged person in one state to $145 per month for the blind in another. The new system would establish a minimum payment of $65 per month for all three of these adult categories, with the Federal Government contributing the first $50 and sharing in payments above that amount. This will raise the share of the financial burden borne by the Federal Government for payments to these adults who cannot support themselves, and should pave the way for benefit increases in many states.

For the single adult who is not handicapped or aged, or for the married couple without children, the new system would not apply. Food stamps would continue to be available up to $300 per year per person, according to the plan I outlined last May in my message to the Congress on the food and nutrition needs of the population in poverty. For dependent families there will be an orderly substitution of food stamps by the new direct monetary payments.

•The new approach would end the blatant unfairness of the welfare system.

In over half the states, families headed by unemployed men do not qualify for public assistance. In no state does a family headed by a father working full-time receive help in the current welfare system, no matter how little he earns. As we have seen, this approach to dependency has itself been a cause of dependency. It results in a policy that tends to force the father out of the house.

The new plan rejects a policy that undermines family life. It would end the substantial financial incentives to desertion. It would extend eligibility to all dependent families with children, without regard to whether the family is headed by a man or a woman. The effects of these changes upon human behavior would be an increased will to work, the survival of more marriages, the greater stability of families. We are determined to stop passing the cycle of dependency from generation to generation.

The most glaring inequity in the old welfare system is the exclusion of families who are working to pull themselves out of poverty. Families headed by a non-worker often receive more from welfare than families headed by a husband working full-time at very low wages. This has been rightly resented by the working poor, for the rewards are just the opposite of what they should be.

• The new plan would create a much stronger incentive to work.

For people now on the welfare rolls, the present system discourages the move from welfare to work by cutting benefits too fast and too much as earnings begin. The new system would encourage work by allowing the new worker to retain the first $720 of his yearly earnings without any benefit reduction.

For people already working, but at poverty wages, the present system often encourages nothing but resentment and an incentive to quit and go on relief where that would pay more than work. The new plan, on the contrary, would provide a supplement that will help a low-wage worker—struggling to make ends meet—achieve a higher standard of living.

For an employable person who just chooses not to work, neither the present system nor the one we propose would support him, though both would continue to support other dependent members in his family.

However, a welfare mother with preschool children should not face benefit reductions if she decides to stay home. It is not our intent that mothers of preschool children must accept work. Those who can work and desire to do so, however, should have the opportunity for jobs and job training and access to day-care centers for their children; this will enable them to support themselves after their children are grown.

A family with a member who gets a job would be permitted to retain all of the first $60 monthly income, amounting to $720 per year for a regular worker, with no reduction of federal payments. The incentive to work in this provision is obvious. But there is another practical reason: Going to work costs money. Expenses such as clothes, transportation, personal care, Social Security taxes and loss of income from odd jobs amount to substantial costs for the average family. Since a family does not begin to add to its net income until it surpasses the cost of working, in fairness this amount should not be subtracted from the new payment.

After the first $720 of income, the rest of the earnings will result in a systematic reduction in payments.

I believe the vast majority of poor people in the United States prefer to work rather than have the government support their families. In 1968, 600,000 families left the welfare rolls out of an average caseload of 1,400,000 during the year, showing a considerable turnover, much of it voluntary.

However, there may be some who fail to seek or accept work, even with the strong incentives and training opportunities that will be provided. It would not be fair to those who willingly work, or to all taxpayers, to allow others to choose idleness when opportunity is available. Thus, they must accept training opportunities and jobs when offered, or give up their right to the new payments for themselves. No able-bodied person will have a "free ride" in a nation that provides opportunity for training and work.

• The bridge from welfare to work should be buttressed by training and child care programs. For many, the incentives to work in this plan would be all that is necessary. However, there are other situations where these incentives need to be supported by measures that will overcome other barriers to employment.

I propose that funds be provided for expanded training and job development programs so that an additional 150,000 welfare recipients can become jobworthy during the first year.

Manpower training is a basic bridge to work for poor people, especially people with limited education, low skills and limited job experience. Manpower training programs can provide this bridge for many of our poor. In the new manpower training proposal to be sent to the Congress this week, the interrelationship with this new approach to welfare will be apparent.

I am also requesting authority, as a part of the new system, to provide child care for the 450,000 children of the 150,000 current welfare recipients to be trained.

The child care I propose is more than custodial. This Administration is committed to a new emphasis on child development in the first five years of life. The day care that would be part of this plan would be of a quality that will help in the development of the child and provide for its health and safety, and would break the poverty cycle for this new generation.

The expanded child-care program would bring new opportunities along several lines: opportunities for the further involvement of private enterprise in providing high quality child-care service; opportunities for volunteers; and opportunities for training and employment in child-care centers of many of the welfare mothers themselves.

I am requesting a total of $600 million additional to fund these expanded training programs and child-care centers.

• The new system will lessen welfare red tape and provide administrative cost savings. To cut out the costly investigations so bitterly resented as "welfare snooping," the federal payment will be based upon a certification of income, with spot checks sufficient to prevent abuses. The program will be administered on an automated basis, using the information and technical experience of the Social Security Administration, but, of course, will be entirely separate from the administration of the Social Security trust fund.

The states would be given the option of having the Federal Government handle the payment of the state supplemental benefits on a reimbursable basis, so that they would be spared their present administrative burdens and so a single check could be sent to the recipient. These simplifications will save money and eliminate indignities; at the same time, welfare fraud will be detected and lawbreakers prosecuted.

• This new departure would require a substantial intitial investment, but will yield future returns to the nation. This transformation of the welfare system will set in motion forces that will lessen dependency rather than perpetuate and enlarge it. A more productive population adds to real economic growth without inflation. The initial investment is needed now to stop the momentum of work-to-welfare and to start a new momentum in the opposite direction.

The costs of welfare benefits for families with dependent children have been rising alarmingly the past several years, increasing from $1 billion in 1960 to an estimated $3.3 billion in 1969, of which $1.8 billion is paid by the Federal Government and $1.5 billion is paid by the states. Based on current population and income data, the proposals I am making today will increase federal costs during the first year by an estimated $4 billion, which includes $600 million for job training and child care centers.

The "start-up costs" of lifting many people out of dependency will ultimately cost the taxpayer far less than the chronic costs—in dollars and in national values—of creating a permanent underclass in America.

From Welfare to Work. Since this Administration took office, members of the Urban Affairs Council, including officials of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Department of Labor, the Office of Economic Opportunity, the Bureau of the Budget and other key advisers have been working to develop a coherent, fresh approach to welfare, manpower training and revenue sharing.

I have outlined our conclusions about an important component of this approach in this message; the Secretary of HEW will transmit to the Congress the proposed legislation after the summer recess.

I urge the Congress to begin its study of these proposals promptly so that laws can be enacted and funds authorized to begin the new system as soon as possible. Sound budgetary policy must be maintained in order to put this plan into effect—especially the portion supplementing the wages of the working poor.

With the establishment of the new approach, the Office of Economic Opportunity will concentrate on the important task of finding new ways of opening economic opportunity for those who are able to work. Rather than focusing on income support activities, it must find means of providing opportunities for individuals to contribute to the full extent of their capabilities and of developing and improving those capabilities.

This would be the effect of the transformation of welfare into "workfare," a new work-rewarding system:

For the first time, all dependent families with children in America, regardless of where they live, would be assured of minimum standard payments based upon uniform and single eligibility standards.

For the first time, the more than 2 million families who make up the "working poor" would be helped toward self-sufficiency and away from future welfare dependency.

For the first time, training and work opportunity with effective incentives would be given millions of families who would otherwise be locked into a welfare system for generations.

For the first time, the Federal Government would make a strong contribution toward relieving the financial burden of welfare payments from state governments.

For the first time, every dependent family in America would be encouraged to stay together, free from economic pressure to split apart.

These are far-reaching effects. They cannot be purchased cheaply or by piecemeal efforts. This total reform looks in a new direction; it requires new thinking, a new spirit and a fresh dedication to reverse the downhill course of welfare. In its first year, more than half the families participating in the program will have one member working or training.

We have it in our power to raise the standard of living and the realizable hopes of millions of our fellow citizens. By providing an equal chance at the starting line, we can reinforce the traditional American spirit of self-reliance and self-respect.

RICHARD NIXON

TEXT OF MANPOWER MESSAGE

Following is the complete text of President Nixon's August 12 message to Congress on manpower training: (For story, see p. 1480.)

TO THE CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES:

A job is one rung on the ladder of a lifelong career of work.

That is why we must look at manpower training with new eyes: as a continuing process to help people to get started in a job and to get ahead in a career.

"Manpower training" is one of those phrases with a fine ring and an imprecise meaning. Before a fresh approach can be taken, a clear definition is needed.

Manpower training means: (1) making it possible for those who are unemployed or on the fringes of the labor force to become permanent, full-time workers; (2) giving those who are now employed at low income the training and the opportunity they need to become more productive and more successful; (3) discovering the potential in those people who are now considered unemployable, removing many of the barriers now blocking their way.

Manpower training, in order to work on all rungs of the ladder, requires the efficient allocation by private enterprise and Government of these human resources. We must develop skills in a place, in a quantity and in a way to ensure that they are used effectively and constantly improved.

Today, Government spends approximately $3 billion in a wide variety of manpower programs, with half directly devoted to job training; private enterprise spends much more on job training alone. The investment by private industry—given impetus by the profit motive as well as a sense of social responsibility—is the fundamental means of developing the nation's labor force. But the Government's investment has failed to achieve its potential for many reasons, including duplication of effort, inflexible funding arrangements and an endless ribbon or red tape. For example:

- A jobless man goes to the local skill training center to seek help. He has the aptitudes for training in blue collar mechanical work, but no suitable training opportunities are available. At the same time, vacancies exist in a white collar New Careers project and in the Neighborhood Youth Corps. But the resources of these programs cannot be turned over to the training program that has the most local demand.
- A 17-year old boy wants to take job training. The only manpower program available to him is the Job Corps, but its nearest camp is hundreds of miles away. With no other choice, he leaves home; within 30 days he had become homesick or feels his family needs him; he drops out of the Corps and has suffered "failure" which reinforces his self-image of defeat.
- A big-city Mayor takes the lead in trying to put together a cohesive manpower program for the entire labor market area—tying together jobless workers in the inner city with job openings outside the "beltway." He finds it difficult to assemble a coherent picture of what's going on. Manpower programs funded by different agencies follow different reporting rules, so that the statistics cannot be added up. Moreover, there is no single agency which maintains an inventory of all currently operating manpower programs. He knows that help is available—but where does he turn?
- An unemployed high school drop-out in a small town wants to learn a trade in the electronics field. His local employment office tells him that there is not enough demand in his town for qualified technicians to warrant setting up a special training class in a local public school. He is also told that "administrative procedures" do not lend themselves to the use of a local private technical institute which offers the very course he wants. This youngster walks the streets and wonders what happened to all those promises of "equal opportunity."

This confused state of affairs in the development of human resources can no longer be tolerated. Government exists to serve the needs of people, not the other way around. The idea of creating a set of "programs," and then expecting people to fit themselves into those programs, is contrary to the American spirit; we must redirect our efforts to tailor government aid to individual need.

This government has a major responsibility to make certain that the means to learn a job skill and improve that skill are available to those who need it.

Manpower training is central to our commitment to aid the disadvantaged and to help people off welfare rolls and onto payrolls. Intelligently organized, it will save tax dollars now spent on welfare, increase revenues by widening the base of the tax-

2 per 1000. The smaller-than-usual declines were concentrated in durable goods industries, particularly in transportation equipment where the automobile model changeover began somewhat later this year than usual.

Total accessions--new hires plus rehires and transfers from other establishments in the company--increased by 2 per 1000, after an allowance for usual seasonal changes.

The factory quit rate, which normally rises as job opportunities improve,remained in July at the June level of 24 per 1000 workers, seasonally adjusted. The quit rate in July was up substantially from a year ago, but remained below the post-Korean highs recorded in 1966.

Layoffs rose from 11 to 12 per 1000 in July, seasonally adjusted, mainly because of larger-than-expected layoffs in non-durable goods industries. However, layoffs were down from their July 1967 level.

36,000 ON WELFARE IN 8 STATES
TO BE TRAINED FOR JOBS

WASHINGTON--Nearly 36,000 persons currently receiving welfare payments in eight States will have a chance for training and jobs, Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz has announced.

The eight States will provide training through 26 local WIN

(work incentive) projects. The States are Arizona, California, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, South Dakota, Utah, and West Virginia.

A total of $26,795,256 has been earmarked for the 26 projects with $5,362,655 worth of services or funds being supplied by the States. Projects will be administered in the States through the various State employment services.

Nearly 23,000 WIN training slots will be available immediately. The number of training opportunities and monies allocated for each State are: Arizona, 800, $1,094,986; California, 12,000, $16,500,000; Iowa, 700, $725,261; Kansas, 700, $845,667; Missouri, 1,800, $2,285,847; South Dakota, 400, $447,608; Utah, 800, $796,250; West Virginia, 4,440, $4,099,637.

This brings to 18 the number of States now participating in WIN programs and to 57 the number of projects. More than $36 million has been allocated for these projects.

By June 30, 1969, an estimated 92,000 training opportunities will have been made available as the States join the WIN program. A total of $100 million has been set aside for work and training projects for the year. Another $35 million is being provided for day-care facilities for children whose mother are participating in the program.

The program will be in operation in every State by July 1, 1969.

Under present legislation, unemployed fathers on public assistance must be referred to a State WIN program within 30 days of the program's inception. In addition, priority will be given to welfare recipients presently enrolled in work training programs to avoid unnecessary gaps and delays in training.

Eligible for the WIN program are members of households receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children, who are over the age of 16 and not in school full-time. The Exceptions are:

1) The sick, the incapacitated, and the elderly;
2) Those who live too far away from a WIN center to make practical;
3) Full-time students;
4) Persons whose continuous presence in the home is required because of the illness or incapacity of another member of the household.

A person referred to the WIN program who refuses to participate without good cause may have his portion of the family's welfare payments cut off. This action would be taken only after opportunity for hearings by an impartial body.

Secretary Wirtz said that large numbers of persons receiving public assistance are expected to volunteer for work training and job placement under the WIN program.

industries. The decline in the transportation equipment industry (40,000 seasonally adjusted) was the result of the later-than-usual automobile model changeovers. The decline in primary metals (15,000) reflected lower steel production resulting from excessive steel inventories.

Average hourly earnings for rank and file workers on private payrolls were unchanged in August at $2.85. Because of the slightly longer workweek, however, average weekly earnings for these workers rose by 29 cents to $109.16. Over the year, average hourly earnings have risen by 16 cents (5.9 percent) and weekly earnings by $5.86 (5.7 percent).

1.9 MILLION DISADVANTAGED SERVED
BY HUMAN RESOURCES PROGRAM

WASHINGTON -- Over 1.9 million disadvantaged individuals, mostly from big-city slum areas, were assisted through the Department of Labor's Human Resources Development (HRD) program in one year, Secretary of Labor Willard Wirtz has announced.

In the 12-month period from August 1967 through the end of July, 1968, more than 1.6 million of the hard-core unemployed and underemployed received a wide range of services through the HRD program and were referred to job openings. Over 840,000 were placed in jobs.

The Human Resources Development concept is applied throughout the Labor Department's public Employment Service system to all disadvantaged persons who are in need of job and training services. The key to HRD is "outreach". The program reaches out to all who are willing to work -- to help them find a good job. It is a person-to-person approach by the Federal-State Employment Service to reach, communicate with, and assist those who need job assistance the most.

Under the HRD concept, the hard-to-place jobless are screened into jobs -- not screened out by barriers beyond their control, Secretary Wirtz said.

Of the 1.9 million disadvantaged brought into contact with HRD, the majority were men under 22 years old, with 8 to 11 years of schooling. Specifically, 53 percent were men; 49 percent were 22 years of age, 15 percent were over 45 years old, with the rest between 22 and 44; 56 percent completed school between grades 8 and 11, 16 percent dropping out of school before eighth grade, and the rest having completed high school.

Special counseling techniques adaptable to the hard-core jobless have been used to determine the disadvantaged individual's ability, interests and assets. To this end, almost 1.2 million such counseling interviews were held nationwide during the 12-month period.

A total of 250,500 individuals served by HRD were referred by the Employment Service to a training facility for eventual referral to a job opening. Almost half of these individuals (more than 116,000) were enrolled in either on-the-job or classroom training under provisions of the Manpower Development and Training Act. Others were enrolled in such programs as the Job Corps (about 35,000), the Neighborhood Youth Corps (over 69,000), and in work-training programs conducted under the Economic Opportunity Act (about 11,500).

Similarly, almost 110,000 disadvantaged were referred to supportive services for pre-employment help before possible referral by the Employment Service to job openings. These services included medical, dental, or psychiatric examinations or treatment (over 17,000), as well as rehabilitation services such as agencies for the blind (about 29,000), and welfare agencies which provide financial assistance, child care, and similar services (almost 15,000).

Charles E. Odell, director of the U.S. Employment Service, stressed the importance of the employability improvement services under the Human Resources Development program.

"Improving employability means developing those qualities and skills in a person that give him reasonable expectation of securing meaningful employment," he said. "Employability services are intended to help the person become a 'somebody', to achieve an occupational competence in job skills, job literacy and job attitudes which enables him to think of himself as a person of status and worth in the mainstream of the American economy."

Another feature of the HRD concept is job development. In many situations the hard-core unemployed do not qualify for specific job openings on file in Employment Service offices. Development of a job in terms of the potential and assets of the individual is an integral part of HRD.

Almost 370,000 such job development contacts with employers, employer organizations and labor unions were made by Employment Service offices during the 12-month period.

(MORE)

HRD offices are located in areas most accessible to the people the program is trying to help -- usually in the heart of the ghettos of big cities. The facility housing HRD services is sometimes labeled Employment Service Opportunity Center, Manpower Center, Human Resources Development Center, or a similar identifying name.

Paradox of Soaring Aid Costs Plagues Affluent U.S. Cities

BY CHESLY MANLY

The main question on which the future of American cities depends is whether enough welfare recipients can be helped to become productive citizens before they are transformed from a permanently dependent class to a revolutionary special interest class.

The paradox of constantly rising welfare costs despite unexampled affluence and minimal unemployment is a cliche, but it is true and it gets worse every year.

Total expenditures for social welfare programs — federal, state, and local—in fiscal year 1968 were 112.4 billion dollars, an increase of 12.9 billion over 1967. Increases in the two previous years were similar and the total increase, from fiscal 1965 to fiscal 1968, was 35.3 billion dollars. For the three years preceding fiscal 1966 the total increase was only 14.5 billion.

More Get Public Aid

Altho more than 24 million Americans — one out of every eight—were receiving social security checks and 868,000 were getting unemployment compensation last August, a total of 9,272,000 were on public assistance. This was an increase of 714,000 in the number of public assistance recipients in one year.

Daniel P. Moynihan, President Nixon's adviser on urban affairs, has said that "social welfare expenditures are quite low in the United States as compared with other western nations, and public assistance has consistently used up only about 1 per cent of the national income."

The cost of public aid in fiscal 1968 was 11 billion, 135.3 million dollars, and this was 2.5 billion dollars more than 1 per cent of the gross national product of goods and services [GNP], which was 860.7 billion dollars in 1968.

Moreover, the December issue of the Social Security Bulletin notes that all social welfare expenditures, including social insurance, public aid, health and medical programs, veterans' programs, education, housing, and other programs; amounted to 13.7 per cent of the GNP in fiscal 1968, as compared with 11.8 per cent in fiscal 1965. The federal government spent 61 billion dollars and the state and local governments spent 51.4 billion in fiscal 1968.

Welfare Costs Increase

In relation to total government expenditures, social welfare costs increased from 42.5 per cent in fiscal 1965 to 43.7 per cent in fiscal 1968. Welfare costs accounted for 32.7 per cent of the federal government's spending in fiscal 1965 and 35.1 per cent in fiscal 1968.

The cost of public aid almost tripled in eight years, rising 270 per cent from 4.1 billion in fiscal 1960 to 11.13 billion in fiscal 1968. Social insurance payments rose in the same period, from 19.3 billion to 42.85 billion, or 220 per cent.

Since the first social security payments were made in 1940, Congress has periodically increased monthly benefits to keep pace with the effects of inflation on the cost of living. A general increase of 13 per cent or more in February, 1968, was the sixth since 1940, and President Johnson's budget message for fiscal year 1970 recommended another 13 per cent increase, effective next Jan. 1.

Value of Dollar Down

Since the first payments were made, the value of the dollar, as compared with its purchasing power in 1940, had declined to 39.9 cents in August, 1968. The last increase in payments, according to the Social Security Bulletin, barely compensated beneficiaries for increases in living costs and did not equal wage gains and higher standards of living achieved by American workers.

In his campaign last fall, President Nixon advocated automatic cost of living increases in social security payments. In the December Social Security Bulletin, Wilbur J. Cohen, then secretary of health, education, and welfare, said the general benefit level should be raised by 50 per cent as quickly as possible.

Cohen also recommended increases in the amount of earnings subject to the payroll tax from the present $7,800 a year to $10,000 in 1970 and $15,000 in 1972, President Johnson recommended increasing the earnings base to $9,000 in 1970.

Finance Payment Hike

Cohen said the increased income resulting from a higher earnings base would go a long way toward financing the proposed increases in payments to beneficiaries. To keep the system self-financing, however, "the ultimate contribution rate paid by employers and employes . . . would have to be increased somewhat," Cohen said.

The present rate is 4.8 per cent each for employers and employes and President Johnson recommended increasing it to 5.3 per cent each in 1970. Under existing law the rate would increase gradually to 11.8 per cent—5.9 per cent each for employers and employes —in 1987, but Congress undoubtedly will accelerate the increases.

Payments Based on Need

In 1962, Abraham Ribicoff, then secretary of health, education, and welfare, said a 10 per cent payroll tax—5 per cent each on employers and employes—was about the limit that the people would stand for. That concept seems to have been forgotten.

Michael Harrington, chairman of the American Socialist party, and other proponents of income equalization already are clamoring for social security gardless of how much the beneficiary earned before retirement. They argue that payments geared to earnings during the recipient's working life are in inverse relation to need, that people who have been poor all their lives get smaller pensions than the rich, and so on.

The same income equalizers argue that people who are too poor to pay income taxes should receive housing subsidies equal to deductions allowed for interest paid by home owners on their mortgages and should receive a "negative income tax" equal to the $600 personal exemption allowed for taxpayers and their dependents. That is, a family of four with no income tax liability would get $2,400, or as much as would be required to bring its total income up to a minimum standard fixed by Congress.

Another variant of the income maintenance idea would simply guarantee each family a minimum amount, say $4,000 for a family of four. The amount would be greater in the larger cities.

System Is Bankrupt

Moynihan contends that the present welfare system is bankrupt and must be drastically revised. In an article titled "The Crises in Welfare" in The Public Interest [Winter, 1968, he says:

"The true issue about welfare is not what it costs the taxpayers but what it costs the recipients. Evidence — as usual—is practically nonexistent, but the probability is strong that the present welfare system is serving to maintain the poorest groups in society in a position of impotent fury. Impotent because the system destroys the potential of individuals and families to improve themselves. Fury because it claims to do otherwise."

Moynihan says the system undermines the stability of family life among the poor, particularly the urban Negro poor. He ascribes this evil effect particularly to the AFDC [aid to families of dependent children] program.

Number Drops Sharply

He notes that between 1953 and 1961 the number of white AFDC families in which the father was not married to the mother dropped sharply and the total number of white AFDC families increased only slightly, because families with unemployed parents were made eligible for AFDC assistance. In the same period, Moynihan says, the number of nonwhite AFDC families "more than doubled and much of the increase came from the fatherless family segment, which itself more than doubled."

Moynihan also asserts that "militant civil rights activists [regardless of their own color] are in revolt, not only against white American society but also against the established Negro leaders . . . these militants are seeking to transform welfare recipients into a powerful interest group that will no longer be forced to accept whatever bargain the welfare establishment could strike with the larger society but rather will themselves become a party to the negotiations."

Notable among the "militant activists" is Prof. Richard A. Cloward of the Columbia School of Social Work. Moynihan says Cloward "proposes a 'strategy for crisis' based on the proposition that twice as many persons are eligible for welfare benefits as those who actually receive them and that by organizing the poor to demand their rightful benefits a crisis can be induced in state and local government revenues of such magnitude as to force the national government to guarantee an annual income.

Readily Adapted Strategy

"It should be noted, however, that while Cloward's objective — the inclusion of the poor in the larger, affluent society — is conservative, his strategy is readily adapted to the desires of many who would wish such a crisis to bring down the whole system."

Moynihan advocates "a strategy of income equalization." Altho he says "the negative income tax and similar arrangements would divide the

NEGRO CAMERAMAN STARTS BALL ROLLING

TV-Radio School for Blacks to Open at USC

BY JACK JONES
Times Staff Writer

When Bill DuBois, 34-year-old black cameraman for NBC television, was in Watts filming the Harry Dolan play "Losers Weepers" in 1966, he found himself surrounded by youngsters and adults wanting to know how one got into the business.

The constantly repeated question really meant: "How does a black person get in?"

DuBois had only recently come from New York and found that the number of Negroes working behind the scenes—in all aspects of technical and production work in television, radio and recording — was abysmally small.

"I had always wanted to do something about getting more Negroes and Mexican-Americans into the technical end," DuBois says. "That experience in Watts really motivated me."

DuBois began talking to Stan Duke, Negro sportscaster for KNXT and a former cameraman and audioman, to James Randolph, radio station KGFJ program manager, and to Michael Jones, a Los Angeles and Pasadena businessman.

Now, after a year of effort and what DuBois calls enthusiastic response from the communications industry and unions, the Watts Training Center for the Television, Film, Radio and Recording Industry is about to be launched.

With the cooperation of Dr. Edward W. Borgers of USC's Department of Telecommunications, the first class of 15 students will begin work Feb. 12 on the USC campus, with instructors and equipment made available by the industry itself.

The Watts Training Center—which will not be in Watts and which will also stress training of Mexican-Americans—hopes to move to a former supermarket at Western Ave. and Imperial Highway when it can raise $100,000 of the $1 million it will eventually cost, completely outfitted.

Already, KABC-TV has contributed $100,000 worth of recording equipment to aid in the initial training for radio work.

As a nonprofit corporation whose active and honorary trustees include numerous big names in community affairs, business and the entertainment industry, the Watts Training Center seeks to raise funds from private foundations, donations and in-kind contributions like that from KABC-TV.

(An unrelated project, New Communicators, Inc., currently teaching filmmaking to 19 poor persons—predominantly Negroes and Mexican-Americans—is operating under a one-year, $253,000 research and demonstration grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity.

(That program, directed by Jack Dunbar in leased quarters at Hollywood Blvd. and Argyle Ave., has the cooperation of more than 20 non-theatrical film companies which will provide on-the-job training for students, many of whom are interested in social commentary, documentary and educational films.

(Dunbar describes his program as one aimed at "setting up conditions to allow communications to flow out of minority communities to the outside world.")

As for DuBois and his group, their primary interest is to increase the number of minority-group individuals with the technical qualifications necessary to hold the jobs beginning to open up in the television, radio and recording industries.

Although unions and the industries have begun to recognize the urgency of the situation, it has not always been thus.

Only last July, the Federal Communications Commission issued a strong warning to broadcasters that discrimination of hiring behind the cameras and microphones as well as in front of them might jeopardize licenses.

And the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has scheduled a March 12 hearing here into minority hiring practices of the communications industry as well as the aerospace industry.

Just Don't Exist

"The problem," says Duke, "is that qualified technicians don't exist in the minority communities. Why would you train for something you don't think you can get into? It's like me training to be an astronaut."

Although the talent areas have taken on a highly visible integration, "only 3% of all performers really make a steady living at it," says Duke. "Training for acting is just a waste of time."

DuBois adds, "We're only interested in getting people into steady jobs."

DuBois indicates he is pleased with the cooperation he has received from almost everyone contacted.

Brownlee Haydon of the RAND Corp. helped the group outline its program proposal. Other help came from the staffs of City Councilman Thomas Bradley and Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Los Angeles).

Recruiting Program

While professional people—both black and white—have given their time and effort, groups like the Watts Community Coordinating Council and the Watts Labor Community Action Committee have been drawn in to help recruit students and make community participation an integral part of the project.

While the initial class will be a small one concentrating on radio technician work, the group hopes to have up to 150 trainees in all technical fields within a short time—and, hopefully, to have its own center open.

The plan includes placing trainees with the networks and cooperating independent stations on summer relief stints leading to future and permanent jobs.

DuBois says, too, that in addition to radio-TV and motion picture training, the center will attempt to spin off self-sustaining companies such as a recording firm under a Watts label.

"We want to help build a stable community," he says.

nation between those who receive the benefit and those who pay for it," he recommends a system of family allowances as a means of "redistributing income in such a way as to benefit the child-rearing portion of a nation's population."

"The advantages of a family allowance are many," Moynihan writes. "It is paid automatically, requiring no means test, nor a great burocracy. It is provided not for adults, but for children, in response to the one fact that any group can be brought to agree on, namely that kids cost money."

Tactics Invite Slurs

In the same article Moynihan says "a most powerful member of the United States Senate, the man in charge of the legislation involved, openly refers to the poverty-rights mothers as 'Black Brood Mares, Inc.' and in truth their tactics have invited such racial slurs." Moynihan does not explain why a family allowance system offering cash inducements for procreation would not have the same effect.

Moynihan proposes a modest beginning, with monthly payments of $8 for each child under 6 and $12 for each child between 6 and 17. Other proponents of a family allowance system have not been so modest, and the social security administration already has calculated the probable annual cost of four separate plans.

The bulletin for March, 1968, estimates that it would cost 20.9 billion dollars to pay $25 a month for every child, 6.7 billion to pay $25 a month for each child after the second, 41.2 billion to pay $50 a month for every child, and 13.3 billion to pay $50 a month for each child after the second.

Welfare Engage 7/1/69

Welfare reform is high on this nation's agenda for today.
By asserting in its "Shapiro" decision the right of poor people to move. . .

The Supreme Court Has Helped a Little Bit

by GROVER C. BAGBY

In our affluent society, we have devised dozens of ways for projecting our hostility on poor people. In a nation where success is heavily identified with financial achievement, the poor are tagged as losers. Generally speaking, the US gives the back of its hand to the needy and at the same time praises itself for its generosity.

However, ours is the only country among the Western industrial nations which has failed to adopt a general system of child or family allowances. Among thirteen Western European nations, in the period 1958-1960, social welfare expenditures as a percentage of gross national product ranged from a high of 17 per cent in West Germany to a low of 8.9 per cent in Ireland. In the US, during the same period, the figure was 7 per cent, lower than any.[1]

The reasons for comparatively low achievement in the welfare field are complex in the United States. Children's allowances are not the only possible approach to a rational welfare system. Nevertheless, the irrationalities of the present scheme[2] are surely in part an expression of the fact that the citizens on Main Street, for the most part, view people in poverty with distaste and resentment.

The general citizen's attitude toward poor people bases itself largely on the assumption that most of them are lazy, or irresponsible, and somehow themselves solely to blame for their financially deprived condition. There is little in fact to justify such assumptions.

Poor Families in Labor Force

Most poor families are already in the labor force, but are being paid too little to put them on the minimum subsistence level. Out of 7.2 million poor families reported in 1963, 4.6 million were headed by working people. 3.6 million of these worked full time. All 4.6 million, however, were living below the poverty line as defined by the Social Security Administration.[3]

The major share of the non-working poor cannot be in the labor market—they are too young or too old or too sick or too handicapped. Of the 2.6 million poor families headed by non-workers, it is important to note that 1.5 million of these are headed by persons 65 years of age or older, and that 2 million families are headed by women.[4]

These facts, however, have not yet penetrated the mind and conscience of the average American. The vast underlying assumption in grassroots America appears to be that in most cases the poor don't deserve public aid because they are themselves somehow at fault for their own deprivation.

To observe this critically is not to deny the reality of irresponsibility in human beings, poor or otherwise. Simple observation, however, enables one to question whether the level of irresponsibility among the poor, taken as a class, is greater than it is among the rest of the people. The incidence of theft by employees, of goldbricking on jobs, of corporation milking, of embezzlement, of price-fixing, of exorbitant profit taking, and of the production of goods of inferior quality—these add up to far greater losses to society than do all the real and imagined economic failures of the poor taken together. Nevertheless, the non-poor in the US generally regard the poor as failures through their own fault.

For example, the high geographical mobility of the modern American family has been noted widely as a factor in social and economic upward movement. From the time of Horace Greeley's famous dictim, "Go west, young man," until the present, it has been thought highly commendable for Americans to move for the sake of improving their condition. In the case of those on welfare, however, the commendation has turned to condemnation. For a generation it has been almost universal practice in the US to discourage poor people from moving from one state to another by denying them welfare benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled, solely because they had moved interstate recently. For some reason, the search for a higher income is regarded as illegitimate when carried on by the poor, although that same search is regarded as highly legitimate for the rest of us. This is so in spite of the fact that the need for higher income among the poor is greater, relatively and absolutely, than is that of anyone else.

For some reason, the search for a higher income is regarded as illegitimate when carried on by the poor, although that same search is regarded as highly legitimate for the rest of us. This is so in spite of the fact that the need for higher income among the poor is greater.

Court Reminds of Rights of Citizens

Now at long last comes the Supreme Court of The United States to remind us of our own most central governmental principles concerning the rights of citizens. On April 21, 1969, in a 6-3 decision, (Shapiro v. Thompson, etc.), the Court moved to eliminate this particular impairment of the rights of welfare recipients to move their place of residence. In a decision immediately affecting forty states, the Court found that it is unconstitutional for a state to require a period of residency as a condition for the granting of welfare aid.

The Court said: "... the waiting-period requirement is unconstitutional because it 'has a chilling effect on the right to travel.' "[5]

The Court also found that the residence requirement for. welfare aid constituted an unjustifiable distinction between classes of state citizens–those who had lived within the state more than a year, and those who had not. Since national citizenship is primary, under the Constitution, and since state citizenship consists essentially of state residence by US citizens, it is clear, said the Court, that length of residence cannot legitimately be added to the Constitutional specification of residence itself as a qualification for the reception of state-established benefits for its citizens. A reading of Section 1 of Amendment XIV makes this clear:

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any persons of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

The Supreme Court asserted that potential welfare recipients are denied equal protection of the laws if they are denied aid solely because of length of state residency. That is, their rights as citizens within the state are operative from the moment they establish residence in the state. Chief Justice Warren, in a dissent, expressed concern that this decision would set an unfortunate precedent in respect of other residency requirements. His question is legitimate and deserves consideration. Residency requirements, where they impair basic rights of citizens, ought to be struck down. Where they uphold legitimate ends of democratic and responsible government, they may be maintained. Our Court system is designed to make distinctions of just this kind.

The Supreme Court, to this writer's knowledge, has never yet taken the position that the Congress, under its Constitutional authority to provide for the general welfare (Article 1, Section 8), is under mandate to grant financial aid to the poor, any more than the states are under mandate to do so. There can be little question that in modern industrial society such provision is absolutely essential to effective provision for the general welfare, but the Constitution has not yet been interpreted as requiring such financial provision from the public treasury. However, on the general recognition that such provision is necessary, and although present provisions are in most cases niggardly, insufficient, and hedged about with a spate of destructive conditions, all the states and territories, with a significant assist from the national treasury, do make such provision, because Constitutionally it is in their power to do so.

Arguments Justifying Residency Period

Arguments before the Court seeking to justify the period of residency qualifications for welfare aid included the following: (1) that state welfare budget predictability is facilitated, (2) that determinations of residency are made more efficient, (3) that welfare application fraud was safeguarded against, and (4) that job seeking is encouraged. The Court had no difficulty in showing that (1) and (2) were unrelated to the facts, that (3) could be achieved by less drastic means, and that (4) was inappropriate when limited to new residents, since, if true, it would apply just as properly to long-term residents.

There is little hard evidence to show that any significant number of welfare recipients have moved out of state in the past simply and solely to receive higher welfare payments, in spite of the fact that ten states now do not impose a waiting period after the establishment of residence. Nevertheless, this is now the big fear. Present aid levels vary greatly as between particular states. In 1968 average monthly payments in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children program ranged from $67.85 per person in Massachusetts to $8.50 in Mississippi.

Secretary Finch of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has stated that the Court's decision in this case makes "inevitable" the establishment of a minimum national standard for welfare. Present extraordinary variations in welfare levels have long been condemned by professionals and students in the field. It is unconscionable that children of poverty in one state must live near starvation, while those lucky enough to be born in another state have at least the benefit of a life at minimum subsistence. US citizenship ought to mean something better and more consistent than this. Especially is this so in view of the fact that the greater share of funds in categorical welfare programs are provided from the national treasury.

A Great Welfare Migration?

Will a great welfare migration not take place as a result of the Court's decision? Evidence from previous experience is singularly lacking for this. California, Pennsylvania, and Connecticut have no term-of-residency requirements, and their experience does not support the notion of a mass migration.[6] Nevertheless, some state officials in the North are worried. The push for a national minimum standard of welfare support will gather steam steadily from now until its adoption. The Nixon Administration is currently debating the major outlines of such a proposal, along with other needed welfare reforms.

The immediate impact of the Court's decision has been estimated by government officials and reported by James G. Driscoll: "Today, about 9,000,000 persons in the nation are welfare recipients, with the number increasing by 10 per cent a year. Federal officials estimate that the [Court's] decision will add 100,000 to 200,000 poor people to the welfare lists immediately, at a cost of at least $125,000,000 a year."[7]

In view of the fact that the total welfare budget is now. $5.7 billion dollars (December, 1969 figures), an increase in the amount of $125 million is no reasonable cause for a cry of alarm. As a matter of fact, the price seems pretty insignificant when measured against the amount of human misery and deprivation which has heretofore been perpetuated unconstitutionally by the regulations the Court has now struck down. High on the agenda for today is welfare reform, and in its Shapiro decision, the Supreme Court has helped a little bit.

THE PROGRESS OF THE PEOPLES

Americans, who are adding $80 billion to a national income of over $850 billion and giving less than $2 billion to world development, need to begin to see the world as a single system in which the wealth of each is dependent upon the wealth of all.

by BARBARA WARD

The developing nations today are not static or stagnant. With an average growth rate of 4.8 per cent a year they are growing more rapidly than did the Atlantic world in its decades of development a century ago. They are positively leaping forward compared with the full stop to all growth which took place in the depressed '30s. Yet two heavy anxieties cloud a picture which is, in essence, much more encouraging than popular judgment often supposes.

1. The 4.8 per cent rate of growth has been sustained by critically important inputs of foreign exchange—of dollars and marks and francs and sterling—made available either by ordinary investment, which however does not reach the poorest lands, or by economic assistance, which shows more and more alarming signs of falling away, or by international trade, which is pretty well rigged in favor of the rich nations showing few signs of being willing to lessen the bias in their own favor.

Parents exercise "responsible parenthood" when the preconditions of development -- health, schools, jobs, hopes -- are becoming a reality.

2. Although 4.8 per cent is better than the Atlantic nation's traditional 3 per cent, it is not enough. The reason is well known. In most of the developing countries, population growth, unleashed by the control of epidemics and the beginnings of public health, is driving forward by not much less than 3 per cent a year. This leaves too small a margin for all the required investment in new technologies and for the food, health, and schooling people need to modernize themselves.

Much of the pessimism freely expressed about the prospects of the poor nations springs from the belief that Thomas R. Malthus, who 150 years ago prophesied that rising population would always swallow up the resources needed for investment and growth, may have been wrong in the 1800's but is right now. Is he? The fact that he was wrong before suggests that he may be wrong again and there is, in fact, reason to suppose that the present situation, though difficult, is not hopeless. We now know from history that peoples as diverse as the Japanese, the French, the Italians, the Scandinavians and the British do have smaller families when their standards of living and education begin to rise.

Stabilization of Population

If no population had ever become stabilized, if birth rates had always remained at 3 per cent instead of Europe's and Japan's 1 per cent, the despair would be in order. World population—at 3.5 billions today—cannot go on doubling every twenty-five years without exhausting the resources of our little planet. But the growth rate in developed nations has become more stable and this is precisely because they are developed.

When parents know that most of their children will survive the first five years, when a large family is not the only source of labor on the farm—a tractor represents quite a sizeable unit of "child

Welfare I: A Winter Day in Brownsville

By STEPHEN MACDONALD

NEW YORK—To Mayor Lindsay welfare is "an astronomical problem." To the taxpayers of this city it's the biggest item in the budget, more than a billion dollars spent to support a million people last year. To the House Ways and Means Committee in Washington it's enough witnesses' statistics and analysis of President Nixon's complex reform proposal to fill seven books. But to the Brownsville section of Brooklyn, where half the residents are on relief, welfare is just the humdrum routine of daily life. In Brownsville a welfare caseworker is as familiar a sight as a postman.

Peggy has been a caseworker, or "investigator" as the welfare recipients persist in calling them, "off and on" for the past five of her twenty-five years. At present she is the sole official link between the welfare establishment and 80 Brownsville families, and as such her loyalties are divided. At a minimum she must serve the state by establishing and periodically re-establishing her clients' eligibility and by verifying that they have paid their utility bills and rent, which is where the "investigator" notion comes from.

In addition, if she feels inclined, she can fight the bureaucracy on behalf of her clients, handle their complaints, counsel them, inspire them, push them and refer them to any services she thinks might be helpful. The job offers plenty of latitude. A lazy caseworker can confine his field trips to checking the receipts and his office work to faking reports. Peggy insists she is fairly conscientious, and she puts it down to efficiency born of experience that at least once a week her workday is over well before noon.

On a recent slushy morning Peggy bummed a ride to Brownsville with a curious reporter. Mayor Lindsay has said of the neighborhood, "By every number we have to measure the suffering of a community—narcotics addiction, welfare dependency, sickness and malnutrition—Brownsville is a leader." With that as an introduction, a first-time visitor's initial reaction is likely to be surprise, especially if he is expecting congested tenement buildings oozing misery. Brownsville is more open, and most families occupy one floor of a typical two-story frame house.

But up close it is a dreary place. The streets are deserted, even in daytime, and an elevated railroad track casts a dank gloom on the ground below. Many houses have no heat, and some are without water. On the worst blocks nearly half the houses have only jagged glass edges in the window sash, a sign that paying tenants have departed and left the premises to heroin shooters and other nocturnal opportunists. The occupied houses are shut tight and their shades drawn full down, and almost every family seems to keep a scrawny mongrel to yelp the alarm. By mid-afternoon, when school is out, Peggy prefers to be gone.

Fear and Bare Rooms

Whenever Mrs. A. and her three children are to be visited Peggy schedules them first, so she can be exactly on time. Mrs. A. is afraid to open the door except by precise prearrangement, even though she might recognize her visitor. She would be a poor candidate for robbery, because there is nothing in her apartment to steal. The walls are entirely bare, and no decorative object of any kind is visible. There is nothing that could be called comfortable furniture. The kitchen, which triples as entry hall and living room, contains a row of drooping tin cabinets, a metal table and four straight chairs. Three small bedrooms opening off the kitchen appear to have beds, dressers and one television set, which is on.

For these accommodations welfare pays Mrs. A.'s monthly rent of $115 plus her regular $308 allotment, which is partly determined by the number of children she has. (She, like all New York welfare clients, receives some benefits besides money. One is a monthly surplus-food distribution that includes butter, cheese, flour and canned meat such as Spam. "The distribution is a bureaucratic mess," Peggy said, "but it's good stuff if they can get it." The other important benefit is Medicaid, which absorbs most, but not all, medical expenses. "The service tends to be poor, and I could tell you a few real horror [illegible]," said Peggy.)

thing to do at the time, but that was a long time ago. I'd like to go back and get my diploma now, but I'm afraid I couldn't do the work. School has changed so much, you know. I look at my kids' homework and it's so different from what we used to do. I just don't think I could pass."

"You could pass," replied Peggy. "It isn't that hard. At least you could try, and if you had a diploma you could get a better job, maybe as a teller in a bank. That would be $125 a week in a few months, and more later."

Mrs. B. promised to think about it. Then Peggy pulled out a long form that had to be filled in and began reading the questions. Besides name and address, some of the questions were "How old are you?" "Where is your husband?" "When did you see him last?" "What color is his hair?" Both women handled their roles gracefully and soon the job was finished. They chatted about children and the vicissitudes of the antipoverty program for a few minutes, and then Peggy left.

"She's in good shape," said Peggy. "I try to talk to her about the children, to reinforce her self-confidence in raising them, and I think they'll be all right too. Their home life is good. The only problem is that right outside is one of the country's worst slums."

Right outside across the street is Mrs. C., who lives on the upper floor of yet another two-story frame house and who would make an excellent hate-object for people who loathe the very notion of public assistance. Mrs. C. breeds children for a living. So far she has nine, every one guaranteed to become a social menace. The two eldest, boys in their late teens, were dozing fully clothed on two beds when Peggy arrived for her mid-morning visit. A puffy-faced ninth-grade daughter leaned sleepily against one wall—Mrs. C. and Peggy occupied the apartment's only two chairs—and glared at the visitors. Assorted smaller children, their faces vacant, wandered joylessly from room to room. The apartment, utterly without furnishings, was dingy and dirty. A small kitchen stove supplied the only heat.

Mrs. C.'s rent is $150. She gets that and $391 more a month from the welfare department.

Though Peggy's approach is deliberately unintimidating, Mrs. C. let on that she felt intimidated. Starchy food has turned her to fat, and she sagged into the straight-backed chair across from Peggy, held her head with one hand, stared blankly at the wall and grunted answers to Peggy's questions about the family's health and the lack of heat. Finally Peggy gestured toward the two slumbering young men and said, "You know, you really ought to kick them out, get them to try a little work. You could use the money."

Grunt.

"I'm supposed to reduce your check if they contribute to the family income, but I wouldn't. I think you need the extra money."

Mrs. C. drew herself up. "Are they gonna cut my check again? They just got done cutting it."

Peggy ignored this and turned to the girl. "And what are your plans?" she asked.

"Huh?"

"Do you go to school?"

"Yeah."

"Often?"

"Sometimes."

"Do you know about birth control?"

"Yeah."

Then, to Mrs. C., Peggy said, "Make sure she knows about birth control. That's very important." Then she picked up the receipts and left.

"There's hard-core for you," Peggy said outside. "They're all sick. She has a compulsion to pick bad landlords. We finally got her out of the last place because there was no heat, and now she's in here and there's no heat. She'll be on welfare forever and so will her kids. The girl is 13, and probably sleeping around already, and pretty soon she'll have kids on welfare too.

"Most welfare clients are honest, and most want to work if they can. Not Mrs. C. She wants to sit around and collect money. Can you imagine a normal person wanting to sit around on the stoop all day? She's really sick."

Peggy made three other calls that day—on a husband and wife who are both too ill to work and on two other single women with children.

On the way home she offered a few thoughts. "Two big problems with welfare are the bureaucracy, which everyone knows is a mess, and the caseworkers themselves. Their motivation in taking the job is often negative—people who have failed elsewhere, boys with ego problems, barely-qualified people who need the security of a municipal bureaucracy. These people can't do a good job.

"Of course there are some conscientious, competent caseworkers, but they don't often last. You can keep the treadmill running, but you're not likely to see many accomplishments, and a lot of them don't understand that. They get discouraged and finally destroyed, and they quit."

Blaming the President

Peggy is wary of President Nixon's welfare proposal, even though she knows almost none of its details, because she is wary of President Nixon. For example, she holds him responsible for the New York state legislature's decision last year to reduce welfare payments. "Not that he did it personally, but it was a result of the backlash atmosphere in this country after he was elected. So now blind people don't get taxi money any more, and epileptics don't get a telephone allowance. And the red tape has been increased. Now it takes me a whole day of carrying forms around to do one little job, like getting an emergency check authorized."

Peggy's remedies tend to the short-range pragmatic and the long-range utopian.

"There isn't much you can do very soon, if you're talking about getting people off welfare. The stuff about making them work is no good because there aren't enough jobs, which I suppose has something to do with the unions. Some of the money that was cut should be restored. Beyond that, about all that can be done is what I try to do—give them advice, like where to go to school, how to get a job, how to get medical care, how to shop, how to get a man to support you—how to get access to all the little things that middle-class people take for granted. Part of their lack of freedom is that they don't know about these things.

"As you can see, I'm a coddler. Other workers in my unit are more for pushing them. I push if I think pushing will help—that's a small percentage of cases.

"It took me a long time to come up with my long-range 'answer' because basically I'm pessimistic. But if we're ever going to get people off welfare, I think the only way will be by intensive individual psychiatric therapy, and I'm talking about three or four decades. It would be cheaper in the long run than what we're doing now. I've mentioned this to a few people, and hardly anyone agrees with me, but we have to get at why these people are on welfare, what the real reasons are. At present there's absolutely no effort to deal with the fundamental problems, which have to do with things like race, sex and family. I'm aware of the studies showing that intensive casework doesn't help, but I'm talking about 30 years, with qualified people. Nothing like that has ever been tested.

"And it probably won't be. You'd have to get rid of the backlash, which means re-educating the public. Even at the welfare center a lot of the people, especially some of the clerks that see all those checks going out, they actually hate the clients. Do you know what I mean?"

blocks nearly half the houses have only jagged glass edges in the window sash, a sign that paying tenants have departed and left the premises to heroin shooters and other nocturnal opportunists. The occupied houses are shut tight and their shades drawn full down, and almost every family seems to keep a scrawny mongrel to yelp the alarm. By mid-afternoon, when school is out, Peggy prefers to be gone.

Fear and Bare Rooms

Whenever Mrs. A. and her three children are to be visited Peggy schedules them first, so she can be exactly on time. Mrs. A. is afraid to open the door except by precise prearrangement, even though she might recognize her visitor. She would be a poor candidate for robbery, because there is nothing in her apartment to steal. The walls are entirely bare, and no decorative object of any kind is visible. There is nothing that could be called comfortable furniture. The kitchen, which triples as entry hall and living room, contains a row of drooping tin cabinets, a metal table and four straight chairs. Three small bedrooms opening off the kitchen appear to have beds, dressers and one television set, which is on.

For these accommodations welfare pays Mrs. A.'s monthly rent of $115 plus her regular $308 allotment, which is partly determined by the number of children she has. (She, like all New York welfare clients, receives some benefits besides money. One is a monthly surplus-food distribution that includes butter, cheese, flour and canned meat such as Spam. "The distribution is a bureaucratic mess," Peggy said, "but it's good stuff if they can get it." The other important benefit is Medicaid, which absorbs most, but not all, medical expenses. "The service tends to be poor, and I could tell you a few real horror stories, but it helps," said Peggy.)

Poverty and extreme fearfulness are not the whole of Mrs. A.'s difficulties. In addition she is mentally retarded, a condition that demands much patience from anyone trying to talk to her. Peggy first inquired about the children, because she thinks they are the best hope in the A. family, but the mother was taciturn. Then Peggy explained some details of Mrs. A.'s lease, tried to persuade her to see a doctor about an old complaint and, as she always does, urged her to be conscientious about birth control. Mrs. A. was not unfriendly or uncooperative, but it was a one-sided conversation. After about 15 minutes Peggy collected the rent and gas receipts and said goodbye.

Outside she explained, "Her mother lives nearby and takes pretty good care of her. There's not much I can do. She's too retarded to work, or even to take proper care of the children. She's afraid to leave the house, so they never get outdoors. She doesn't talk much, so they don't talk much. I'd like to find a program for the kids, but so far I haven't been able to." (A week later, after having been told again and again by her supervisor that no such program existed, she happened on one operated by a private agency.)

A Startling Difference

One block down the street is an almost identical two-story house, the top floor of which is rented by Mrs. B. and her six children. Knowing just this, and having come from Mrs. A.'s home, a visitor would be startled. Mrs. B.'s apartment is straight out of a Sears & Roebuck catalog. Mrs. B., a trim and voluble woman in her late 20s, showed Peggy to a cozy wood-paneled dining nook and offered her a cup of instant coffee. The kitchen was spotless, and so was the big modern refrigerator-freezer.

Mrs. B. is obviously better off than most welfare clients, and one reason is that she is, as Peggy says, "a together person"—bright, well-organized and reasonably free of neurosis. Another reason is that she works as a part-time stenographer for an antipoverty agency, supplementing her $470 monthly welfare payment. Her rent takes $130 of that. The current incentive program allows a working mother to keep the first $30 a month of what she earns and one-third of the rest, and it provides money for a baby-sitter.

Peggy expects Mrs. B. to work her way off welfare eventually, but because her family is so large it will take time. "I've had clients earning $200 a week," she said. "If you have eight children that still puts you below standard."

Mrs. B. would be more attractive to prospective employers if she had a high school diploma, but she lacks one semester of study. "I dropped out the spring of my senior year," she said. "I thought that was a pretty smart

Welfare II: The Nixon Plan Assessed

By Robert L. Bartley

NEW YORK—Everyone knows that if the typical welfare mother goes out and gets a job today, her benefits will be cut by whatever she earns. And everyone knows that under President Nixon's new welfare proposals she will get to keep half her wages, and for the first time will have incentive to work.

So as Congressional and public debate on the Nixon proposals approaches, everyone will do well to remember what Socrates or somebody pontificated: It's not what you don't know that gets you into trouble, it's knowing all those things that ain't so.

In fact, the mother who takes a job already gets to keep $30 a month in earnings plus a third of anything above that figure. Here in New York, where the typical welfare mother typically lives, the Nixon plan would give her $60 plus a third of the balance. Since she is already keeping a third of the second $30, the next incentive about which the President waxed so eloquent amounts to $20 a month.

The insignificance of this sum by no means proves there's no case for the Nixon proposals, or even that the plan wouldn't help some in getting recipients into the labor force. It does warn, though, against relying too much on face value in evaluating the program—and especially in balancing the implicit bargain in which it has been packaged: That liberals would get a guaranteed income floor and conservatives would get a new emphasis on work.

Taking anything about welfare at face value, for that matter, is hardly prudent. Nothing about the subject is simple or straightforward. What's more, the current law is already in a state of flux, descending into confusion that must be endured to be appreciated. Take for example, what seems a simple question: Whether a welfare recipient gets to keep any earnings if he or she goes out and gets a job, without bothering to enroll in any special program.

Ask this while sitting with three officials working full-time with welfare. One says no, another says yes and the third says come to think of it she'd be curious about that herself. They call a fourth official more directly involved, and he has to look it up. The answer is that a mother is entitled to keep a portion of her earnings, but for reasons of legal mickeymouse, the father of an intact family is not.

Defining the Confusion

Most of the confusion, which is by no means isolated to any single group of officials, results from the Social Security Amendments of 1967, large portions of which became nationally effective only last July 1. These amendments, written by the House Ways and Means Committee headed by Rep. Wilbur Mills, foreshadowed the emphasis on work in the Nixon plan. They established incentive payments for families headed by mothers, expanded work training, allocated more funds for day-care of children of working mothers, and required that "appropriate individuals" be referred for either work or training.

The Nixon proposal would do all the same things, on a somewhat larger and slightly simplified scale. It proposes to spend $600 million on work-training and day-care, for example, compared to $164 million in the 1967 act. In broadening coverage to include all families earning less than given limits, it abolishes categorical distinctions such as the one currently barring incentive payments to fathers. It would require all recipients to be referred for work or training except the disabled, mothers of pre-school children and a few others.

The Nixon plan would guarantee a family of four an income of about $2,350—$1,600 in Federal cash payments and about $750 worth of food stamps redeemable at grocery stores. States would be required to maintain present benefits, which means all but a few of them would be supplementing the Federal grant. Under its work-incentive provisions, $60 a month in earnings would be disregarded. For every dollar in earnings above that the Federal grant would be reduced 50 cents and the state supplement reduced 17 cents. In other words, working recipients would for the most part keep 33 cents on a dollar of earnings, the same as under the 1967 law.

In evaluating the prospects that the Nixon plan will reduce welfare dependency by putting people to work, it's logical to inquire what the effect of the 1967 law has been so far. In many cases it's simply too soon to tell; few if any parts of it have been effective long enough to reflect anything but inevitable start-up difficulties. Even so, there is a body of experience suggesting at least some of the problems involved. And while that experience can scarcely be called conclusive, it certainly can't be called encouraging either.

New York City, as it happens, has a bit more than usual experience with the employment incentive idea. Even before the 1967 law, it started a demonstration project offering work incentives to the 200,000 families receiving aid to dependent children. The incentives were larger than those either in the 1967 law or in the Nixon plan. Over the two years of the demonstration project, heads of about 8,000 families went to work. Each case represents some net benefit both to the state and the family. But the number of cases closed due to increased earnings, that is, the number who actually worked themselves entirely off the welfare rolls, was 235.

A few rules peculiar to the demonstration project limited enrollment somewhat, but Max Waldgeir, deputy commissioner of the Department of Social Services here, says this was not the major factor. "A whole lot of other things are related to the ability or lack of ability for the welfare mother to work," he says, "It's not just the employment incentive; it depends on other social-service facilities, day-care, the health of the children. You don't have a large reservoir of ready-to-go-to-work people."

The Nixon plan hopes to provide not only incentive but day-care and training, of course, expanding on similar provisions in the 1967 amendments. But again, experience is not encouraging. In fiscal 1969 Congress allocated $22.6 million for day-care nationwide. With transfers to other programs, lapsed appropriations, carry-overs into future years, the states actually managed to spend only $4 million of this. So far at least, the obstacles would not appear to be the kind that can be overcome by larger spending.

In fact, perhaps the chief obstacle to rapid expansion of day-care facilities is local licensing and building-code requirements, which set standards for such facilities that are nearly impossible to meet, especially in slums. Much of the day-care actually provided is "in-home," meaning welfare departments provide money for baby-sitters. There is also the problem of economic feasibility. Day-care costs approach $2,000 per child per year, and if a mother has three children it costs less to pay her welfare than to send her to work and pay day-care.

Training welfare recipients for higher-paying jobs would help, of course, and this approach is incorporated in the 1967 law's work-incentive, work-training program (WIN). It works like this: Caseworkers are instructed to assess their clients to see which might be "appropriate" for training or work. The ones selected are referred for medical exams to be certified for work. The caseworker draws up the paperwork, which is reviewed and passed along by his supervisor, a WIN clerk at each welfare center and the WIN central office. When the papers reach the state employment service, it sends a letter inviting the recipient in for an interview.

Each recipient is assigned to a five-man team responsible for fitting individuals in proper jobs or training. After an interview or a few of them, the recipient is assigned to a WIN "component"—an orientation course on work habits, an eighth-grade equivalency course, a high school equivalency course, training in such occupations as secretary, practical nurse or auto mechanic.

No 'Dead-End' Jobs

At some point the recipient may be referred directly to work, provided the job in question is not a "dead-end" one in the judgment of the employment service. Neither WIN nor the Nixon proposals would force recipients to take unskilled jobs such as janitors or domestics, though recipients who voluntarily take them are entitled to incentive payments. In the New York City employment incentive demonstration project some 40% of the total working recipients were holding unskilled jobs.

(In fact "family splitting and refusal to take unskilled and semi-skilled jobs" were cited as primary reasons for the rise in the city's welfare caseload in a report released Tuesday by the Center for New York City Affairs at the New School for Social Research here. Many welfare mothers could work, it contended, "but are disinclined to take the jobs available to them because the monetary gain does not outweigh the inconvenience of working.")

WIN has only been operating about a year, and Maurice Robinson, deputy director for administration of the city social services department, is doubtless correct when he says it's too early to judge its effectiveness. But because of such problems as delay with enrollees in "holding time" between components, fewer than 150 recipients have actually been placed in jobs through WIN here in the city. Mr. Robinson adds, "There is at least an equal number who've gone out and got jobs on their own. I think that's encouraging, when clients get so fed up with the process they go out and get a job."

The WIN program has been somewhat more successful in other cities, suggesting that although New York City has over 10% of the national welfare caseload, what happens here is not necessarily a precise indicator of what may happen nationwide. Unlike some other local departments, for example, New York has taken the position that no mother is "appropriate" for WIN referral unless she volunteers. Spokesmen for the city have traditionally been among the leaders in seeking higher benefits for welfare recipients and less coercion of them.

The Nixon plan would include a number of bureaucratic adjustments to reduce state-to-state variations in administration. Discretion on what individual is "appropriate" for training and work, for example, would be replaced by a few closely defined categories. The referral process would be taken out of the hands of the states and placed under the Federal Social Security Administration. The plan does have a formal requirement that to maintain benefits most recipients must accept training or "suitable" employment, and the Administration says this clause means the plan is not a guaranteed annual income.

The Nixon Administration's heavy rhetorical emphasis on work may in itself have some effect on the attitudes of the relevant bureaucracies. More money will be available on day-care and training where that would help.

for the first time will have incentive to work.

So as Congressional and public debate on the Nixon proposals approaches, everyone will do well to remember what Socrates or somebody pontificated: It's not what you don't know that gets you into trouble, it's knowing all those things that ain't so.

Discretion on what individual is "appropriate" for training and work, for example, would be replaced by a few closely defined categories. The referral process would be taken out of the hands of the states and placed under the Federal Social Security Administration. The plan does have a formal requirement that to maintain benefits most recipients must accept training or "suitable" employment, and the Administration says this clause means the plan is not a guaranteed annual income.

The Nixon Administration's heavy rhetorical emphasis on work may in itself have some effect on the attitudes of the relevant bureaucracies. More money will be available on day-care and training where that would help. Work incentives would be available to more people and earlier, before they sink into complete dependency. Sometimes such subtle changes prove powerful, and possibly they mean the plan will, just as the President says, help get more people off welfare rolls and on payrolls.

An Iffy Proposition

That seems a highly iffy proposition, though, given the recent experience. Even if there are significant numbers of people on the welfare rolls who can work, it seems quite clear that the principles of work incentives, training day-care and whatnot are not self-realizing. Making them work will at best require a prodigy of administration. And so far as work is concerned, the principles in the Nixon plan really do not go far beyond the principles Mr. Mills and the rest wrote into the law back in 1967.

The new principle in the plan, and one subject to expansion in future years, is a national income floor. The advantages of the plan have less to do with incentive than with equity: Recipients in the few states that pay less than the plan's Federal floor would be treated more fairly. Those who earn low wages really should get more money than the non-working welfare recipient, and the Nixon plan would give them some Federal money. Families headed by fathers would be treated equally with those headed by mothers.

These are real advantages, of course, even if they are not the ones called up by Presidential rhetoric. They are not the advantages of more work but of more welfare, and on this the Nixon proposals ought to stand or fall.

HOUSE BODY TAKES 'IMPORTANT' STEP TOWARD REFORMING NATIONAL WELFARE PROGRAM, SHULTZ SAYS

WASHINGTON -- Labor Secretary George P. Shultz has praised the House Ways and Means Committee for "acting with dispatch" on President Nixon's Family Assistance Program.

He said the Committee has taken "an important step toward reforming the Nation's welfare program and moving persons from welfare rolls to payrolls."

The text of Mr. Shultz' statement on the Committee's action on the measure follows:

The House of Representatives Committee on Ways and Means has taken an important step toward reforming the Nation's welfare program and moving persons from welfare rolls to payrolls.

The Committee and its Chairman -- Congressman Wilbur Mills -- are to be congratulated for acting with dispatch on President Nixon's Family Assistance Program.

This program represents a sound and rational approach for solving a critical national problem -- a public assistance program that is perpetuating rather than ending dependency.

As President Nixon has said, the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program is a "colossal failure."

The President's welfare reform bill is a fresh approach that stresses work.

-- It provides financial incentives to go to work.

-- It requires adults who should do so to register with the Employment Service and accept suitable training and employment. The "escape" clauses in existing AFDC law are eliminated.

(MORE)

-- It covers the working poor, thus rewarding work rather than penalizing it.

-- It provides for a larger training effort for welfare recipients -- a quarter of a million additional training opportunities during the first year.

-- It corrects basic inequities among the States that encourage movement to crowded urban slums.

-- It expands child-care opportunities by half a million, so that mothers will be freed to train and take jobs.

The Family Assistance Plan requires a substantial initial investmnet, just as does every successful business enterprise. But it is an investment that will bring substantial returns in the future by ending the cycle of public dependency that traps generation after generation.

We cannot afford the mounting cost of AFDC when it means less money for education, adequate housing, and safe streets.

We have an economy that can generate the jobs its citizens need. Employment is a reasonable -- and achievable -- solution to providing adequate income.

I urge that Congress continue to act in this vital matter with the sense of urgency demonstrated by the House Ways and Means Committee.

WELFARE WAITING RULES in two states were unconstitutional, the High Court held.

Acting without a hearing, the Supreme Court affirmed lower court judgments that laws requiring a one-year waiting period for welfare aid in New York and Connecticut are unconstitutional. Both states reacted to the ruling by calling for a federal take-over of welfare costs and said they faced fiscal crises. In another case, the Justices skirted a test of the power of Texas officials to bar the sale of underground newspapers on state university campuses. And they called for reargument in two cases, one involving the government's attempt to prosecute former Sen. Brewster (D., Md.) on bribery charges.

The court's welfare-case action indicates that, despite the addition of four Nixon appointees, it isn't about to reverse its 1968 ruling that states can't deprive migrants of welfare.

Court enforcement of job-bias laws, sought by the Nixon administration, was rejected, 43-41 by the Senate in favor of giving the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission power to issue cease-and-desist orders. But two hours later, the upper house voted to reconsider its decision. Whether the EEOC or the courts would enforce equal-opportunity laws has been a key issue in strengthening the panel.

California Faces HEW Warning on Losing Welfare Funds Unless Ethnic 'Bias' Ends

2/5/72

By JONATHAN SPIVAK
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—The Health, Education and Welfare Department's civil-rights enforcers are about to make their first move to counter discrimination against ethnic minority groups.

Within a few weeks, HEW is expected to warn California that it stands to lose more than $900 million in federal welfare funds unless it ends what federal officials consider discriminatory treatment of Mexican-American poor.

The California controversy centers on whether the state's failure to hire sufficient numbers of Spanish-speaking welfare workers deprives Mexican-Americans of their rights under the 1964 Civil Rights Act. If it does, by depriving them of welfare services or payments, the penalty would be a cutoff of all federal financial support or court action by the Justice Department to force compliance.

California previously faced an aid cutoff because of welfare-law violations, but this will be its first major confrontation over civil-rights issues. The outcome could have important implications for all state welfare programs.

Examining Welfare Compliance

In response to complaints by Mexican-American and poverty-group lawyers, HEW agents are examining civil-rights welfare compliance in the California counties of Los Angeles, Sonoma, Tulare, San Joaquin, San Mateo, Santa Clara and San Diego. These counties contain more than 80% of the state's 4.2 million Mexican-Americans.

HEW has found that Mexican-Americans constitute only about 8% of California's welfare work force, while making up 20% of the state's population. "We are saying we want California to employ bilingual (Spanish-speaking) people in welfare, not for employment, but because it relates to equal delivery of welfare," explains J. Stanley Pottinger, director of HEW's Office of Civil Rights.

The formal investigation will be completed in early March. But California officials already have been told they have a problem on their hands. HEW would like the proportion of Spanish-speaking supervisory, policy-making and public-contact welfare workers to be as great as the proportion of Mexican-Americans among potential recipients.

HEW interviewed 200 to 300 state employes and submitted a questionnaire to 11,000. "Even the state's own personnel admit they are unable to serve Spanish-speaking people," reports one HEW man.

HEW civil-rights experts hope the California case will serve as a precedent to compel similar steps by welfare departments in other states. "California is the largest state in terms of Spanish-speaking minority and probably the most difficult to do it in," comments one federal specialist. The key requirement would be hiring workers who are familiar with the language and customs of the ethnic groups served. Technically, such a regulation could be enforced by HEW's Social and Rehabilitation Service through its powers to approve or disapprove state welfare plans.

The requirement for equal delivery of services to ethnic groups also will be extended by HEW civil-rights officials to federal health programs.

Confined to Education

Currently, the major HEW effort is confined to education. Under Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the department has charged 15 school districts in Texas and one in Arizona with discriminating against Spanish-speaking students. The ultimate penalty would be cutoff of federal funds, which make up 25% to 30% of the budgets of many districts. But HEW expects to go to the mat with only Uvalde, Texas, a small rural community.

The department argues that the failure of these school districts to provide instruction in Spanish means students are often discriminatorily assigned to slow-learning classes or otherwise deprived of equal educational services. As proof, federal experts cite evidence that school achievement of the minority-group students falls increasingly behind their white counterparts as they progress through the schools.

Investigation of ethnic minority school-discrimination complaints has been broadened to include several dozen other school systems, including Buffalo, N.Y.; East Chicago, Ind., and Boston.

Nixon Administration Permits 3-Year Trial of Reagan Plan To Put 'Able-Bodied' in Jobs

Special to THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

SACRAMENTO — California Gov. Ronald Reagan said the Nixon administration will permit an experiment requiring 58,000 "able-bodied" welfare recipients in most California counties to perform public work part-time, or face a welfare cutoff.

At a press conference, the governor said the three-year trial program would begin April 1 and would involve all "employable" welfare recipients in 35 of the state's 58 counties. "Employable" means all welfare recipients between 18 and 65 years old, unless they are mothers of children under six, hold other part-time jobs, take some kind of training or are physically unable to work.

Elliot L. Richardson, Secretary of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, approved the experiment by waiving certain statutory requirements for HEW demonstration projects.

Gov. Reagan said he was convinced "that the concept of community work experience by the able-bodied on welfare holds enormous promise for the future. It can reintroduce the principle of the work ethic to our way of life."

He also said he discussed the program with President Nixon at the Western White House last year. The President "assured me that he wanted to see it put into effect on a scale large enough and broad enough to give the concept a fair and accurate test," Mr. Reagan said.

Hopefully, 30,000 of the 58,000 eligible welfare recipients will be placed in jobs by state and local governments at year-end, the governor added. The part-time jobs would include such positions as janitors, playground monitors, messengers, clerks, typists and geriatric aides.

In reply to a newsman's question, Gov. Reagan said he anticipates legal challenges to the experiment by welfare rights organizations and similar groups.

New, Tougher Federal Welfare Work Rules To Begin July 1 Seen Causing Controversy

6/22/72

By JONATHAN SPIVAK
Staff Reporter of THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

WASHINGTON—Tough new federal welfare work rules, which take effect July 1, are sure to stir controversy, even though their overall impact isn't clear.

The requirements, adopted last year by Congress, embody many of the principles contained in the Nixon administration's much broader welfare reform proposal still pending before the lawmakers. The adopted requirements call for nationwide registration for work by most recipients of Aid to Families With Dependent Children (AFDC); a cutoff of benefits if they refuse to accept jobs or training, and creation of public service jobs if other employment alternatives aren't available.

Controversy will center over:

—How adamantly the Labor Department insists that women with school-age children accept employment, particularly if the jobs available are menial ones;

—The administration's reluctance, for budgetary reasons, to expand the program much beyond the current level of 130,000 recipients a year—only a fraction of its potential, advocates argue; by next June, enrollment is expected to rise to only 160,000;

—The preference provided male welfare recipients over females for job training and jobs—a rash of court suits are anticipated to challenge this principle constitutionally;

—The need for costly bureaucratic procedures to register up to 2.5 million welfare recipients and interview 750,000, although federal funds are available to help only a handful.

Welfare Job Training Program

The new program would make significant changes in the federal government's five-year-old attempt to train welfare recipients, known as the WIN for work incentive, program.

Registration and work, if available, would be mandatory for most adult AFDC recipients, including mothers of school-age children. There are certain exceptions, such as women with children under the age of six, but, ironically, pregnant mothers must register for work and will be given high priority for job placement. As soon as their babies are born, however, they no longer need to work. "We'll have to find them jobs fast," comments one Labor Department man.

The Labor Department's manpower administration will be given the predominant role in the WIN program, rather than sharing control with the Health, Education and Welfare Department. The Labor Department's major emphasis will be on placing welfare recipients directly into jobs or on-the-job training, rather than the past policy of classroom instruction.

Public service jobs, such as hospital aides, will be created if other private employment isn't available. Labor Department specialists say this provision will start on a small scale with 8,000 jobs in the coming fiscal year, at least 50 per state. HEW enthusiasts had wanted to establish 12,000 but cost was an obstacle.

Public service employment, fully subsidized by the federal government, is estimated to cost $5,000 to $5,500 a person annually. On-the-job training, in which the employer bears a portion of the expense, costs $2,000. Classroom instruction, the least expensive form of welfare job training, runs about $1,300. But congressional advocates of the new program claim such training courses are useless if jobs aren't available after graduation, a major weakness in the current WIN program.

The administration is asking Congress to allocate an extra $250 million to the welfare work program, more than doubling the budget to $455 million in the coming fiscal year. But reductions in HEW and Labor Department spending for other purposes will avoid any overall expenditure increase, Nixon administration officials say. Most of the added WIN money will be needed to provide medical aid, day care and other social services to prepare welfare recipients for work.

Issue of Welfare Mothers

There's little complaint from liberals over the need for administrative streamlining of the WIN program or more emphasis on jobs. But the big hassle will arise over its compulsory aspect, particularly for welfare mothers. Currently, only five states require mothers to register for work. "Is it right for the federal government to mandate that women leave their kids? This is an issue that hasn't been faced up to," says one HEW specialist.

"Is it right for the federal government to mandate that women leave their kids? This is an issue that hasn't been faced up to," says one HEW specialist.

Welfare rights and poverty law groups are likely to stimulate the struggle against the work requirement. Welfare recipients, particularly mothers, could refuse to register or accept work and demand hearings in an attempt to retain their federal grants. They could argue the jobs are too distant, too dangerous or pay less than their welfare grant.

The Labor Department expects the number of appeals could be substantial: Estimates for the coming fiscal year range from 33,000 to 90,000. In the past, there were only a handful of such contests, labor officials note.

The key consideration will be the type of jobs Labor Department experts turn up for welfare recipients. In the past, these have been few and far from satisfactory. "Under no condition would someone have to take a job that gives him less than welfare," assures one Labor Department specialist.

Paying the Minimum Wage

The law permits payment of the minimum or prevailing wage, which might be lower. But Labor Department specialists argue there is little justification for placing welfare recipients in jobs that don't pay the minimum wage of $1.60 an hour. Assigning welfare recipients to domestic jobs has been a pet goal of Sen. Russell B. Long (D., La.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and one of the chief supporters of the legislation. But federal bureaucrats resist. "I don't see that (housework) increasing a woman's employability potential," argues one.

Some officials worry that pressure to produce results and get recipients off the rolls could lower the Labor Department's standards for matching jobs with workers. "If work is available they (Labor officials) will tend to require people to take it. Proof that you had a high school education and that it is a dead-end job or had a better job before wouldn't be sufficient grounds for refusing employment," argues one welfare expert.

In addition, each state is required after July 1, 1974, to refer at least 15% of its registered AFDC recipients to the Labor Department for work, otherwise, the state could lose up to 15% of its federal AFDC funds. This requirement could generate greater political pressure for pushing welfare recipients into whatever jobs are available.

The ultimate key to the program's success probably will be the course of the economy in coming months. If employment picks up, then job opportunities are likely to open for welfare recipients. If not, the WIN program may remain in as much trouble as ever, despite the extra emphasis and additional money. In the past, it has managed to place little more than 10% of its participants in jobs. "The labor market will either make us heroes or goats. If there aren't jobs out there for these people, the program is going to be a failure," insists one federal official.

Do the Poor Want to Work?

MOST SUCCESSFUL AMERICANS would agree that a steady job is a good thing, providing not only money but self-respect and a purpose in life. Dismayed by the failure of thousands of poor people to hold steady jobs, they often assume that the poor stay on welfare because they don't like to work—in short, because they are lazy. This assumption colors several aspects of federal welfare programs, yet few have asked whether it is a valid guide for policymakers. The title of a recently published study by Leonard Goodwin gets to the point: Do the Poor Want to Work?

This question has a direct bearing on governmental efforts to reduce poverty and unemployment through work-training programs aimed at replacing welfare with "workfare," and on proposals to institute some form of guaranteed annual income. Goodwin notes that work-training programs will fail if the poor have little interest in work, while a guaranteed income might induce them to leave the work force. If, on the other hand, poor people do want to work, a guaranteed subsistence income wouldn't discourage them from working, and the current difficulties of work-training programs would have to be explained by something other than the psychology of the poor.

Goodwin, a member of Brookings' Governmental Studies staff, has sought answers to questions underlying what is generally called the "welfare mess." Do poor people have outlooks on work basically different from those of regularly employed persons? Do poor mothers really prefer to stay on welfare rather than work to support their families? Is there a caste system or "culture of poverty" that distinguishes poor from middle-class families?

In his search for the link between a person's psychological makeup and his performance in the job market, Goodwin measured what he calls "work orientations"—psychological attributes reflected in questionnaire items that cluster together statistically and have psychological meaning. Four of these orientations are particularly important. Life aspirations are derived from questionnaire items such as "having a nice place to live" and "having a regular job" rated on a four-point scale ranging from "best way of life" to "worst way of life." Other major orientations are the work ethic, or degree to which a person identifies his self-esteem with work; lack of confidence, or belief that "luck" or "knowing the right people" determines success; and acceptability of welfare as a source of income.

During the course of Goodwin's study, the work

Bill Filled With Trouble for Poor

Washington

WELFARE REFORM is dead for this session of Congress but measures are very much alive that would eliminate legal aid for the poor, make welfare recipients work for nothing, reduce work incentives and reduce medical aid.

While the Senate's attention was focused on rival welfare reform plans (all of which were defeated), the Senate's Ominbus Social Security Bill was loaded with provisions that will make life harder for poor people.

Nick Kotz, a writer for The Washington Post, is a special correspondent of The Atlanta Journal.
Jack Spalding is on vacation.

The bill is now in a Senate-House Conference Committee where the provisions will prevail unless they are resisted vigorously by Reps. Wilbur Mills, D-Ark., James Burke, D-Mass., Martha Griffiths, D-Mich., and by the Nixon administration.

A FEW OF THE provisions harmful to the poor are:

—A provision that prohibits legal service attorneys from representing the poor in welfare cases, while at the same time they are required to help husbands of welfare recipients. This provision would eliminate the only source of legal aid for most poor people with welfare problems.

—Permission for states to require welfare recipients to "work off" their welfare payments by working on government projects at no pay. At present, work without pay is permitted in only two highly controversial experimental projects.

—Requirement that medically indigent persons qualifying for Medicaid now be required to pay part of their medical costs.

—Elimination of the Social Security law that requires states by 1975 to have a fully adequate medical services program under medicaid.

—Permission for states to cut back services provided by the medicaid program.

—Reduction of the amount of work-related expenses that can be kept by a welfare recipient who is in a work-training job designed to get him off welfare.

—Provision for welfare residency requirement laws. This represents an attempt to legalize state laws which the Supreme Court has ruled unconstitutional three times in three years.

—Elimination of the requirement that states provide free welfare manuals to low income groups and legal service programs. The requirement was designed to help the poor understand the welfare laws.

OTHER AMENDMENTS would create a federal child support program in which the U.S. attorney general and FBI would be involved in enforcing civil and criminal penalties against absent fathers, and would establish federally funded blood typing laboratories to determine paternity of welfare children.

These provisions affecting mothers and their children in the aid to dependent children program have received little attention in a massive bill that also contains a variety of increased social security and welfare benefits for the elderly.

Seeking an explanation of why Congress is aiding the elderly and punishing dependent children and their mothers, Rep. Sam Gibbons, D-Fla., said: "Nobody's mad at the elderly. Maybe it's because we have so many of them around here (in Congress)."

Whatever the explanation, the Senate Amendments (many of which were brought up without notice late at night and were approved by narrow margins) would make life much more difficult for many poor people.

The provision which would bar legal service aid to the poor is opposed by every major association of lawyers in the country, including the American Bar Association and American Trial Lawyers Association.

In urging Congress not to deprive the poor of free legal assistance in welfare cases, ABA President Robert W. Meserve quoted the words of President Richard Nixon. On May 5, 1971, the President said: "The legal problems of the poor are of sufficient scope that we should not restrict the right of (legal service) attorneys to bring any type of civil suit. Only in this manner can we maintain the integrity of the adversary process and fully protect the attorney-client relationship so central to our judicial process."

THE AMERICAN Trial Lawyers Association said the principle of "equal justice under law" is seriously violated by denying legal aid to poor people.

The bar groups also vigorously opposed and branded as "perverse" the amendment which would require the legal defenders of the poor to become, instead, their prosecutors in paternity cases.

The Senate provision requiring the poor to work for nothing to keep their welfare checks would nationalize a pilot project originally approved as a political sop to California Gov. Ronald Reagan. Federal officials say the California program has flopped because state officials soon learned it didn't make much sense to pay day care costs for a woman's children while she worked without earning any money.

The conference committee will act soon. But there is still time for President Nixon to say he continues to believe the poor are entitled to legal aid, and for Elliot Richardson, the secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, to say he still doesn't personally believe in work projects that provide a poor person with nothing but greater despair.—(c1972.)

Justices Hold Existing U.S. Welfare Rules Don't Let States Deny Strikers Benefits

10/17/72

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court held that existing federal regulations don't permit states to deny welfare benefits to strikers.

However, the Health, Education and Welfare Department told the court it intends to "clarify" its regulations so that states can bar such payments.

In other actions, the Supreme Court:

—Upheld an Interstate Commerce Commission ruling that truckers classified as heavy haulers can't compete with general freight truckers in hauling so-called "palletized" shipments. The ICC decision had come under attack from the Justice Department's Antitrust Division, which had called the policy anticompetitive.

—Turned down Morton International Inc.'s plea to review a lower court decision that rejected a damage suit Morton had brought against Southern Pacific Co.

The Welfare Case

In the welfare case, the high court summarily affirmed a lower court ruling that existing HEW regulations don't permit the state of Maryland to withhold welfare payments to otherwise-eligible strikers. Thus, although the case had attracted wide attention as a constitutional test, the Supreme Court didn't decide a striker's claim that the Constitution entitles strikers to welfare or the U.S. Chamber of Commerce's claim that such payments are barred by the Constitution.

Under the welfare program at issue, the federal government provides financial aid to participating states that assist needy families with dependent children when the father is unemployed. Present HEW regulations simply define unemployment in terms of the maximum number of hours a father may have worked in a month and remain eligible.

Maryland eligibility rules comply with the work-hours standard, but also bar benefits for strikers and for fathers who have been fired for "gross misconduct."

Two Marylanders, one on strike and the other fired for alleged misconduct, sued state officials after being denied benefits. They claimed that the Maryland rules were invalid because HEW regulations didn't specifically sanction such denial of benefits and because the rules violated the equal protection clause of the Constitution.

A three-judge federal district court in Maryland rejected the constitutional argument but held that the rules were invalid under HEW regulations.

HEW didn't appeal the decision to the Supreme Court, although it had argued in the district court that its regulations weren't intended to prevent the states from varying their programs on the basis of factors other than hours. Instead, the department said it would "clarify" its rules to "remove any doubt concerning the validity" of the Maryland regulations.

Maryland, however, asked the high court for a full-dress hearing. The Chamber of Commerce also appealed for high court review, arguing that the supremacy clause of the Constitution requires the state and federal governments to deny welfare to strikers. The chamber argued that federal labor law is intended to assure evenly balanced collective bargaining and said that "subsidization" of strikers would "impair, if not destroy," the bargaining position of employers.

The Truck Case

The truck regulation case began nearly a decade ago as narrow controversy over the kinds of freight an ICC-licensed heavy-haul trucker, Ace Doran Hauling & Rigging Co., could transport. The issue broadened, however, into a battle in which the Justice Department accused the ICC of "protectionism (that) doesn't comport with the national transportation policy," as written by Congress.

The court case was legally separate from the Nixon administration's proposals to Congress for rolling back the ICC's legal power to regulate truckers. However, the Justice Department in recent years increasingly has been challenging specific ICC decisions that the department contends are anticompetitive.

The issue before the high court was whether the ICC violated national transportation policy when it ruled in the Ace Doran case that heavy haulers—those restricted to freight that requires special loading equipment because of its size or weight—generally can't haul "palletized" shipments in competition with truckers licensed to haul general commodities. Palletized shipments, which represent a technological advance in freight movements, consist of smaller freight items that are bundled on pallets and mechanically loaded onto trucks.

A three-judge federal district court in Pennsylvania upheld the ICC, on the ground that courts have only limited authority to review regulatory agency decisions.

In appealing for Supreme Court review, the Justice Department asserted that the decision rested on the ICC's "acceptance of the proposition that there is a public need to protect general commodity haulers from competition." Further, the department asserted that the decision doesn't comply with the national transportation policy, which directs the ICC "to promote safe, adequate, economical and efficient service for shippers."

Arguing against high court review, the ICC said it is a "well settled principle that promotion of competition needn't control the commission's exercise of discretion."

The Supreme Court without comment summarily upheld the ICC's position by affirming the lower court.

The Morton Case

The high court also without explanation refused to hear Morton's damage suit, which charged that Southern Pacific has caused injury to Morton's plant on the Great Salt Lake in Utah.

Morton's plant, on the southern end of the lake, has been extracting salt from the lake waters since 1888. In 1956, Southern Pacific was granted an easement by the state for construction of a railroad causeway running east and west across the lake. Morton charged that the causeway has caused a dimunition of salinity in the southern portion and a concentration of salt in the northern portion. The saturation in the north part has caused the loss of millions of tons of salt through precipitation, Morton alleged.

Claiming injury of more than $1 million and warning that its plant will be abandoned in the next few years, Morton sued Southern Pacific for damages and other remedies. The Utah supreme court rejected the suit, holding that Morton "has no vested claim to a beneficial use of the water." Morton unsuccessfully sought high court review of the state court's decision.

Congress to Tackle Social Security Tax, Spending Bills Today

10/17/72

By a WALL STREET JOURNAL Staff Reporter

WASHINGTON—Congress will try today to dispose of measures setting a spending ceiling and raising Social Security taxes—the last two big items blocking adjournment.

House-Senate conference committees reached agreement on the two bills Saturday night. Conferees' work normally is accepted with little controversy, but the Senate possibly may balk at the spending-ceiling compromise.

That bill would limit spending to $250 billion for the fiscal year ending next June 30, and would raise the federal debt limit to $465 billion from $450 billion. The measure restricts President Nixon's discretion in choosing where to cut the more than $6 billion required to keep federal spending below the ceiling. Some Senators believe, however, that the restrictions should be much tighter.

The Social Security bill would raise next year's maximum Social Security tax, paid by both employe and employer, to $631.80 from the current maximum of $468. Further increases would occur in future years.

Missing from the bill is any major overhaul of the nation's welfare system, although the legislation began in 1969 as a proposal by President Nixon for sweeping welfare revision. The legislation does contain a variety of expanded Social Security and Medicare benefits.

Welfare Reform and Rural Poverty In the South: The Alternatives

Introduction and Statement of Purposes:

In recent years the need to reform the welfare establishment has emerged as one of our most frequently discussed domestic issues. Reform proposals such as the Family Assistance Plan, child allowances, the Freedman-Tobin negative income tax, the cash-supplement approach and other like schemes have stirred vigorous debate in the Congress, the federal agencies, and the academic community. At the heart of the issue is the question of what type of welfare structure is both best suited to inducing able-bodied recipients to go to work and to providing an adequate income to those unable to engage in productive labor. In a real sense, the defeat of the family assistance plan closed an important door on welfare reform. But the need for a major revision of the program is too pressing for the issue to lie dormant for long. Pressures for reform will build as the costs of welfare continue to rise.

While no single research project is likely to provide a panacea for the complex problems that surround welfare reform, we believe that the research objectives set forth below will be highly useful to policy-makers engaged in seeking new directions for welfare policy. The purpose of this research is to formulate a set of proposals designed to reform the delivery systems providing aid to southern rural areas and to provide data on their cost-effectiveness. To do this, we must first obtain better information on the sources of cash and non-cash incomes of rural families.

The need for such data is illustrated by the findings of a nationwide survey of poverty-stricken neighborhoods (including some rural areas). This study, directed by Representative Martha W. Griffiths, found substantial evidence of undercounting of incomes by the Census Bureau. According to Representative Griffiths," Some families can get more out of this 'non-system' than they could possibly earn, or more than a high percentage of people in the area are earning. But other equally needy families get little or no aid."

By developing better measures of the income received by rural families and by conducting survey research to determine the full extent of federal, state, and local aid received by the poor we can provide public planners with a better idea of both the abuses and the inadequacies of existing aid programs. Moreover, by coupling our findings with an analysis of the successes and failures of the public aid programs proposed in the Sixties, we would expect to recommend a set of proposals for reforming the existing patchwork of programs.

The five major objectives of this research proposal may be expressed as follows:

(1) To estimate the actual incomes (including government and private transfers and income-in kind) received by rural households. To use these estimates to provide better information than is currently available on both the extent and location of poverty in the rural South. To evaluate the extent to which public aid programs affect the distribution and incidence of poverty.

(2) To identify those households which might be removed from the welfare rolls by measures designed to increase their employability.

(3) To provide a comprehensive evaluation of the dependency reducing programs studied during the Sixties along with a set of recommendations as to which of these might be most effective in alleviating rural poverty.

(4) To involve federal, state, and local officials in the design of a rural poverty survey in order to insure that the data will be useful to social planners.

(5) To conduct a series of policy conferences which will make our research results widely available to federal, state, and local officials concerned with the problems of the rural South.

We believe that the objectives outlined above are consistent with the program goals of the RANN program and that they will be of use to a variety of public agencies. Officials from 3 Southern governor's office have already expressed an interest in the outputs of our study and we expect to receive similar commitments from other states. Several federal agencies have also expressed a desire to both participate in our study and to utilize our results. These include officials of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of the Census, the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the U.S. Department of Labor. We have also received expressions of support from a number of Southern Congressmen and from several regional bodies such as the Southern Regional Council and the Southern Governor's Conference. Additional user linkages will be developed as our work progresses.

The Need:

The research proposed in this document has an immediate relevance to social policy-makers for at least three reasons. First, the Nixon administration has increasingly moved in the direction of exploring means for reducing welfare dependency. To do this, policy-makers must have better data on the welfare population and on the effectiveness of various strategies designed to reduce dependence. Second, more responsibility is being decentralized among the separate federal agencies. Thus, there is an increased need for measures which indicate the total effect of federal aid programs. Third, the shift of responsibility for some social programs from the federal government to the various state and local governments makes it more important than ever before that these levels of government have a complete and up-to-date source of information on the incomes of the poor. They must also be appraised as to which programs are most effective in reducing dependence on public aid and which public aid programs are most efficiently run.

In a recent radio address to the nation, President Nixon spelled out three criteria which are to govern future Federal activities in the social area: (1) Control over decisions should, insofar as possible, be placed in the hands of those directly affected by the decisions, (2) The dollars spent on welfare must be used most effectively to benefit those for whom assistance is intended and, (3) Services should be provided in a manner which fosters self-reliance rather than dependency among recipients.

To carry out these goals, policy-makers will require more detailed information than is currently available. Our detailed search of existing data sources failed to reveal any federal or state data source which provides extensive information on the federal, state, and local subsidies to households. Monthly census documents, such as the Current Population Series, and the Census document itself primarily measure cash income payments from public programs. The dollar value of such income supplements as food stamps, medicaid, housing subsidies, and a host of other services are not included in the census definition of income. Yet households receive almost $3 billion in food stamps plus many other "almost cash" benefits every year.

The extensive research currently underway in connection with the 1971 Survey of Consumer Expenditures (SCE) will not include many of the non-monetary payments made by federal aid agencies to households. Moreover, because of its long lead time and its small sample (17,000 for the entire country), the SCE is unlikely to be of much use to Southern governers interested in developing social action programs designed to combat welfare dependency in their state. There is a distinct need for a state-by-state breakdown of the actual values of public aid payments to the rural poor and this need is unlikely to be met by any federal or state studies in the near future.

The importance of developing a complete accounting of federal aid programs to the poor is further emphasized by the reorganization of federal social action programs so as to place them into separate agencies. Under the recent reorganization scheme, research activities in education, child care and health will be assumed by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, along with certain operational health delivery programs. The Department of Labor will begin to supervise "manpower experimentation" as well as programs designed to assist migrant workers, and housing research will be brought under the Department of Housing and Urban Development. With the decentralization of the various social activities of the federal government the need for an overall accounting for the subsidies of the federal government is likely to grow. As the experience of the Family Assistance Program so aptly points out, a program of welfare reform cannot be undertaken in the absence of a complete understanding of the consequences that the reform will have on the other aid programs received by the poor. Yet, the decentralization of social aid programs makes it less likely that the necessary expenditure data will be obtained by a single agency. The inter-agency nature of the project makes it essential that an outside organization be brought in to do the job.

Moreover, with the advent of revenue-sharing and the shift of control over dollars and program priorities away from Washington it is increasingly important to supply state and local officials with reliable and comprehensive data on aid payments to those living in rural areas. We have no prior conception of whether such data will lead to an increase or a decrease in state welfare rolls. We do know that they will provide policy planners with a more comprehensive picture of what is being done to help the poor than has thusfar been possible. Moreover, by providing a description of the findings on the effectiveness of various social aid programs conducted during the Sixties we expect to provide a valuable aid for the state and local planners making the decisions required of them under the President's new criteria for social programs.

Welfare

Labor Hails New Rules On Welfare

The AFL-CIO gave its "enthusiastic endorsement" to public welfare reforms which the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare predicts will bring greater efficiency, economy and dignity to programs to help the needy.

Federation Pres. George Meany wrote HEW Sec. Wilbur J. Cohen that the new regulations his department has proposed would make "more humane a system which has in many ways been geared to punishing the most disadvantaged in our country."

The chief change would be to require states to rely on first-hand information obtained from applicants in determining whether they are eligible for public assistance.

There would be controls and checks to guard against abuse. But the intent is to end the "snooping" type of home investigation which has placed a stigma on the needy and helpless.

"Besides offering a measure of dignity and self-respect to those who must turn to public assistance," Meany stressed, "the new procedures will release many professional people to do what they have been trained to do—that is, to offer rehabilitation and other social services to people who badly need them."

The other change endorsed by Meany as in line with a policy resolution adopted by the last AFL-CIO convention would make legal help available to welfare recipients who believe their payments have been unjustly reduced or terminated. Payments would continue while the claim was being adjudicated.

Cohen announced the proposed changes Nov. 20, with a 30-day period for comments by interested parties. If finally approved, the new procedures would be binding on states after July 1, 1969. The bulk of the money for the programs—to help needy children, the aged and the disabled—comes from the federal government.

In his announcement, Cohen noted that several states already use the simplified declaration system for determining eligibility and spot checks have found that abuses are no higher—and often lower—than in states which rely on home investigations.

Caseworkers now spend 70 to 95 percent of their time determining who is eligible for assistance payments, the HEW noted. The time, the announcement suggested, could better be spent "helping people solve problems and become more self-reliant and self-supporting."

Meany noted that the indignities to which welfare recipients are subjected too often serve to discourage people in need from obtaining help.

"We applaud the elimination" of eligibility investigations, Meany said. "The controls which are built into the new regulations, we feel, are more than adequate to insure continued good results."

The help to recipients appealing reduction of benefits, Meany added, would change "a paper right" into "a real right for families and individuals faced with reduction or elimination of their only source of income."

Meany concluded: "The AFL-CIO, therefore, strongly supports the proposed regulations and urges their implementation at the earliest possible date."

PUNISHING THE POOR

by

Vernon E. Jordan, Jr.

It looks as though the war on the poor is escalating. The long-sought-for reform of the rotting welfare system was delayed and replaced by proposals that were punitive and unfair. But now, even the inadequate cloak of welfare reform has been stripped away, replaced by a system of forced labor that makes one think of a Siberian labor camp.

If you think that's an exaggeration, Secretary of Labor James D. Hodgson publicly called the plan for a "must-work" welfare system that emerged from the Senate Finance Committee, a move to "convict-type labor."

In effect, the new "welfare reform" would create a vast pool of forced labor that would have to work at below-market wages. Over one million people, 90 percent of whom are mothers whose children are over 6, would either have to find jobs or take whatever jobs are assigned them by a federal employment corporation.

Under this plan, welfare recipients would be split into three groups. The first would consist of those able to find jobs in the private market at the minimum wage, currently an inadequate $1.60 per hour. The second group would be those who would work for private employers at -- believe it or not -- $1.20 per hour, and who would get an additional small subsidy from the government.

The last group -- those unable to find any job at all -- would be assigned to jobs by a federal authority that would pay them $48 a week for a full week's work. Most would be hired out to private employers as maids and domestics.

There is so much that's evil about this system, one hardly knows where to begin to attack it. But it seems clear that the main intent of the proposal is to punish the poor and to set up a nation-wide system of forced labor that has its only parallel in totalitarian dictatorships.

It would create a vast pool of imposed cheap labor that will drive down the regular wage structure. The whole point of a minimum wage is to set a decent floor below which working people should not fall. That is now so shot full of holes that too many people actually have to work for less than the minimum wage. Now, there is the threat that over a million people, most of them women, will be thrown onto the job market without protection of the minimum wage, leading to depressed wages for all workers.

We can pretty well forget about the first category under the new plan -- those who get jobs at the minimum wage. There are over 5 million people who can't find work today. If that many people are unemployed, there's no chance that present welfare recipients can get non-existent jobs.

So we are faced with the prospect of putting up to a million people on the federal payroll who would be forced into degrading and unwanted employment as servants of the whom the system favors. Perhaps the good law makers should be told about the Emancipation Proclamation!

This is just another example of how the old habit of blaming the victim has taken vicious turn. We've got to face the fact that the economic system has malfunctioned. The technological revolution has driven people from the farms to the cities in search of work and the system has not been able to create the jobs and economic stability that would create equal opportunities for all.

It's the system that's failed, not individuals who happen to be poor. The answer is to reform the system, not to punish the poor. Forcing people into low-status, dead-end jobs and creating a sullen army of forced laborers is about as good a way to spark a revolution as can be devised.

Since this plan would even cost more money than previous reform proposals, it doesn't even have the saving grace of having any common sense at all behind it. It is just a mean-spirited attempt by backward-looking people to restore the cruelties and inhumanity of a 1972 version of slavery.

Dear Friend:

Dr. Frank P. Graham has asked me to send you a copy of a letter he wrote recently concerning a new book just published by the University of North Carolina Press. The full text of the letter is as follows:

> Dear Mitch:
>
> Thank you for giving me that remarkable book Cry From The Cotton which was made especially dear to me by your autograph. Professor Grantham has written a very meaningful foreword and Professor Donald H. Grubbs has made all of us in his debt for his very scholarly, interesting, and comprehensive review of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union and the New Deal. His significant history of the sharecroppers movement in these later days adds to our interest in being associated with that movement through the National Sharecroppers Fund.
> In addition to its many other values, the Southern Tenant Farmers Union had a vital part in focusing national attention on the tragic plight of the Southern sharecroppers and tenants and contributed vitally to the establishment of the Farm Security Administration.
> In the course of his story many heroic actions stand out associated with such noble souls as H. L. Mitchell, Gardner Jackson, Howard Kester, Norman Thomas, and their associates. Also I was interested to run across the important roles of some very dear friends such as Professor Calvin Hoover of Duke University, Rupert Vance, a longtime colleague, Arthur Raper, a former student, and Will Alexander of the Rosenwald Fund. By the way, what finally became of Mr. Frank Weems?
> Please pardon my delay in writing this letter. I have for several reasons gotten far behind in my reading and correspondence. With deep appreciation and best wishes,
> Sincerely and gratefully yours,

Southern Tenant Farmers Union Papers 1934-1959

AVAILABLE SOON!

A complete microfilm edition of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union Papers will soon be available from Microfilming Corporation of America, a subsidiary of The New York Times. The collection 1934-1959 should prove invaluable to historians working in the fields of labor relations, 20th century Southern history and the civil rights movement in America. The papers contain a great deal of information on the battle against rural poverty from the New Deal to the programs of President Lyndon B. Johnson. In addition to the papers of leaders of the movement, such as H. L. Mitchell, Norman Thomas and Howard Kester, there is an extraordinary wealth of letters and documents from poor people involved in the activities of the Union, people from whom the historian rarely obtains written evidence.

A quarter century of views, policies and activities in a major segment of agricultural America

The STFU began in 1934 among black and white sharecroppers on the cotton plantations of eastern Arkansas; the movement later spread to Mexican-American farm workers on the West Coast. The Union succeeded in drawing national attention to the plight of the sharecropper, who was plowed up along with his cotton by unanticipated reactions to the New Deal subsidy program (AAA). Its successor organizations focused similar publicity on the exploitation of "wetbacks" (illegal immigrants from Mexico) by corporate farm owners in California and other Western states.

The work of the STFU and its successors led to the formation of two presidential commissions: President Franklin D. Roosevelt's Commission on Farm Tenancy, which gave birth to the Farm Security Administration, an agency of government unique in its effort to aid the rural poor; and President Harry S. Truman's Commission on Migratory Labor in American Agriculture. The latter inspired the AFL-CIO to undertake the organization of migrant farm workers in California under the leadership of Cesar Chavez. The historian will also find a connection between the STFU and the War on Poverty, launched by the Kennedy-Johnson Administrations to cope with the misery stemming from the mass migration of rural people to our urban ghettos, a migration which had its origins in the agricultural policies of the 1930s.

The STFU also deserves considerable credit for the creation of the La Follette Civil Liberties Committee in the United States Senate, which turned the spotlight on anti-labor terrorism and contributed to the success of the C.I.O.

A hard copy guide to the microfilm collection of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union Papers will be included with the microfilm collection.

Further information on the microfilm edition can be obtained from Microfilming Corporation of America, 21 Harristown Road, Glen Rock, New Jersey 07452.

State Asked To Increase Aid to Poor

Welfare Florida

Miami Herald 3-23-69

By GEORGIA MARSH
Herald Staff Writer

A Senate subcommittee has recommended that Florida almost double its spending on medical welfare programs for the poor.

The proposal would make the state eligible for federal funds under the Medicaid program. The state would get about $3 in federal funds for every one it spends.

It also would prevent the state from losing $12 million in federal funds it already receives to provide medical care for the poor.

A BILL calling for a state appropriation of $16 million to implement the Medicaid program has been prefiled in Tallahassee by State Sens. Kenneth Myers, Dade; Louis de la Parte, Hillsborough; and David Lane; Broward, members of a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare, and State Institutions.

The full committee met Saturday in Miami to hear testimony from public health and welfare and nursing home officials concerning the need for Medicaid.

WELFARE PAYMENTS TOP FEDERAL AID FOR SECOND YEAR

Public assistance payments, primarily for welfare, climbed 23 percent in fiscal 1968 and for the second year in a row comprised the largest federal grant-in-aid program, according to U.S. Treasury Department figures.

Foreseeing a continuing trend, President Nixon has proposed changes in the welfare system and other reforms which would overhaul the grant-in-aid system.

Public assistance grants in fiscal 1968 totaled $5,371,543,710—more than one-fifth of the total cost of the $25.1 billion grant-in-aid program. The public assistance share rose approximately $1.1 billion above the fiscal 1967 figure of $4,201,019,238.

These findings emerged from the annual Congressional Quarterly study of federal grants in aid. The basic figures are collected by the Treasury Department from various agencies. CQ then compiles the many individual categories (139 programs in the current study) into larger groupings such as education, health and conservation. The standing of the different programs according to size is the result of CQ's grouping of figures; the Treasury Department does not rank the programs.

Prior to 1967, federal grants for highway construction, maintenance and related activities were the largest category in every compilation by the Treasury Department. In 1967 public assistance for the first time became the largest catagory.

The public assistance category includes several items, but the one which accounts for all but a few million dollars of the total is welfare payments. In Fiscal 1968, this item totaled $5,318,646,825 and included such programs as old-age assistance, aid to the blind and disabled, and aid to families with dependent children.

Since the 1968 fiscal year, which ended June 30, 1968, the trend toward larger total welfare payments had continued. It is expected with or without welfare reform, the public assistance category will remain one of the largest of the grant-in-aid programs for the indefinite future.

In his Aug. 8 speech outlining the "New Federalism," President Nixon announced proposals aimed at relieving the central problem behind increased public assistance costs. Mr. Nixon proposed to turn about the public assistance program by stressing a work requirement, by introducing work incentives, by increasing manpower training opportunities and by offering more child-care services for welfare mothers. (For text, see p. 1517.)

By adding assistance to the working poor, the Administration plan would more than double the number of recipients on public assistance. Any reduction in public assistance costs would be due to the "boot-strap" effects over the long run as assistance recipients were able to help themselves off the welfare rolls. (For welfare costs, see Weekly Report p. 1407, 1490.)

In addition to the public assistance proposals, the President proposed a revenue-sharing program to Congress. Critics of the federal grant-in-aid program have long called for a simpler system. Revenue sharing has been one of the most often mentioned means of overhauling the system. President Nixon's program of federal revenue sharing with the states would begin in the second half of fiscal 1971. A total of $1 billion in federal revenues would be returned to the states in the first full year with increases in five annual steps. "This cuts into the Federal Budget," Mr. Nixon said, "but it represents relief for the equally hard-pressed states."

The payout would rise from one-sixth of 1 percent of taxable income in fiscal 1971 to 1 percent in fiscal 1976 and thereafter. The monies would be divided among the states on a formula based upon each state's share of national population adjusted for the state's relative effort to raise revenue. A "pass-through" formula would ensure that each city and county within a state would receive a portion of the funds in proportion to their relative tax effort within the state.

1968 Grant-in-Aid Figures

CQ's study of the 1968 federal aid payments showed that grants-in-aid to state and local governments and to individuals increased 15 percent from 1967 payments to a total of $25.1 billion. It was the eighth consecutive annual increase in the total amount of federal grants, but a noticeably smaller increase than the 23 percent rise in 1967. (See table I.)

Of the total 1968 grants in aid, $18.6 billion (an increase of 22 percent) went to state and local governments, while $6.5 billion (a decrease of 2 percent) went to individuals.

Total federal tax revenues in fiscal 1968 amounted to $153.7 billion. The $25.1 billion in federal grants in aid returned 16 percent of these revenues to the states. In fiscal 1967, federal grants in aid returned 15 percent of tax revenues to the states.

All but four states received increased payments per capita in 1968 from what they received in 1967. Iowa and Nebraska showed decreases in total funds granted and in the amount granted per capita. (Iowa was down from $428,941,000 and $156 per capita in 1967 to $393,514,000 and $142 per capita in 1968; while Nebraska received $317,236,000 or $221 per capita in 1967, compared with $266,858,000 or $185 per capita in 1968. Nevada received an increase in the amount it was granted in 1968 but not enough to offset a population increase as per capita income from the grants was down one dollar to $170 in 1968. Kansas received enough of an increase to offset its population increase and hold the per capita grant level at $179.

For the first time in recent years, grants in aid to education overtook agricultural grants to become the third largest category. Aid for education was $4 billion, a 30-percent increase during fiscal 1968. The biggest gains were for higher education activities from $33 million in 1967 to $385 million; and for elementary and secondary school activities from $1.2 billion to $1.5 billion.

Some of the other highlights of the fiscal 1967 figures are summarized below:

- Aid for highways increased $175 million to $4.2 billion, mostly from a $198 million increase in highway trust funds as other programs generally saw a slight decrease in funds.
- Aid for agricultural conservation, extension work and research increased $300 million to $3.5 billion despite a 45-percent decrease, to $832 million, in the feed grain program. Increases in agricultural aid were spread generally throughout the other programs.
- Antipoverty aid programs increased 32 percent to $1.8 billion. The largest increase was $322 million for community action programs, but the most dramatic and the second largest gain was the increase in Appalachian Regional Development funds from $6 million to $87 million.
- Aid for business development and area redevelopment showed a 475 percent increase to $115 million. Of the total $95 million increase, $71.5 million additional funds went for development facilities grants. Another $7.4 million was provided for a new program in planning and research.
- Aid for veterans benefits increased 65 percent to $505.8 million during the year. The increase came primarily for readjustment benefits and vocational rehabilitation.

Simplifying Aid, Revenue Sharing

For years state and local government heads have grumbled that the federal grant-in-aid system was a bureaucratic jungle, too complicated to assist in the way it was intended. The system has been marked by rapid growth in payments and programs. Payments grew from $6.5 billion in fiscal 1957 to $25.1 billion in fiscal 1968. The system expanded in programs until, in 1968, the Federal Government was administering more than 400 different federal aid programs. Many of these programs overlapped in purpose but had different eligibility requirements, application procedures and funding practices, because they were administered by different agencies.

After a six-year study by a Senate subcommittee and after much Presidential prodding, Congress in October 1968 passed the Intergovernmental Cooperation Act (PL 90-577) designed to improve the program of administering federal grants-in-aid to local governments.

Organizations representing local government officials cited the Act as a step in the right direction. Other observers noted that it was being administered by the Bureau of the Budget and said this indicated more caution than innovation. Included in the Act were titles providing for improved administration of grants in aid to the states; directing the President to establish federal inter-governmental coordination for grant administration; and providing for a periodic review of federal grant-in-aid programs. Some backers of the Act said it was critical that provisions left out would have consolidated federal grant-in-aid programs and established uniform federal relocation and land-acquisition assistance.

President Nixon April 30 asked Congress for power to consolidate closely related federal assistance programs and place them in a single agency. The President said that only closely related programs would be merged and limits of the grants would be changed as little as possible. The House Government Operations Subcommittee on Intergovernmental relations began hearings on the proposal in June. The Subcommittee has not completed hearings on the matter. (For hearings, see Weekly Report p. 1512.)

Revenue Sharing. In January 1968, the Republican Coordinating Committee, warned in a report that the trend of federal-state relations was leaning more and more toward "virtual monopoly of power in Washington." The report further charged that if the trend continued until 1973 when federal grants in aid were estimated to reach $60 billion, state, local and municipal governments would be reduced "to subdivisions which take most of their orders from the federal administrators who hand out the money." (1968 Almanac p. 508)

President Nixon in his "New Federalism" speech Aug. 8 said, "For a third of a century, power and responsibility have flowed toward Washington—and Washington has taken for its own the best sources of revenue. We intend to reverse this tide—not as a way of avoiding problems, but as a better way of solving problems." The President sent his revenue-sharing message to Congress Aug. 13.

Since an 1836 revenue-sharing attempt in which Congress divided most of the Treasury surplus among the states, revenue sharing has been relegated to a small part of the federal grant-in-aid system. It usually has consisted of limited funds—such as from the sale of timber—normally earmarked for a special purpose. Several revenue-sharing bills have been offered in Congress since 1958. Republicans have generally favored revenue-sharing plans with few strings attached to replace present financing of state and local governments. Democrats, on the other hand, have generally favored revenue sharing to supplement existing financing. Among opponents of revenue-sharing proposals in the past has been Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D Ark.), of the House Ways and Means Committee. President Nixon's proposal will be referred to that committee. (For further background and information, see 1968 Almanac p. 505, 508, and Weekly Report p. 159.)

How Programs Work

Many factors account for the uneven distribution of aid payments, both within programs and between programs. Allocation formulas vary greatly from one program to the next. Some, like the public assistance programs, are intended to provide greater federal participation to low-income states which generally have a proportionately high number of needy persons and low assistance payments. Such a program has the effect of redistributing income from high-income to low-income states.

Other programs, like benefits paid to veterans, result in allocations that vary mostly according to population.

Other types of programs tend to benefit some states much more than others because of the special character of the need that is met. This is true especially of payments to farmers under agricultural programs which benefit primarily the South and Midwest while grants for urban renewal and public housing benefit the more urban sections of the country.

TABLES

Further details about federal aid programs appear in the accompanying tables.

Table I. Shows the amounts from fiscal 1959 through fiscal 1968 for total payments, payments to state and local governments and payments to individuals, together with the percentage increase or decrease for each category over the previous year and since 1959. Amounts listed as tax collections are actually internal revenue collections and do not include customs receipts and some other items. They to not include Social Security payroll taxes, nor do federal payments include Social Security benefits paid out. Thus the ratio of payments to taxes is only a rough indication of the relationship in any single year.

Table II. Shows each state's allocations under the largest payments programs conducted by the Federal Government. The allocations are arranged to conform with the descending size of the programs. Individual programs have been combined into 14 special categories to convey the scope of federal aid in major areas of legislation. The data is taken from Treasury Department reports. However, the designation of the 14 categories and the placement of Treasury data in each category is done by Congressional Quarterly. The categories used by CQ are broad groupings in order to show the general pattern of federal aid activities. As a result, many specific grant programs could be included in more than one category; CQ attempts to place them in a category that is closest to the basic purpose of the grant.

Table IV. Shows for each state total payments, estimated population, and per capita share of payments for fiscal 1968. Payments in fiscal 1968 averaged $126 per person compared with $110 in fiscal 1967. The state receiving the highest per capita aid was Alaska with $433. The state receiving the lowest per capita aid was New Jersey with $71. Alaska and New Jersey have represented the high and low of per capita federal aid since fiscal 1959, the first year of Alaska's statehood.

Welfare Reform

RECOMMENDED PRINCIPLES - WELFARE COMMITTEE
Community Council of the Atlanta Area, Inc.

The Welfare Committee of the Community Council recommends these principles to guide establishment of a national income maintenance program to protect all citizens against the risk of poverty. The main emphasis in any such programs should be an improved way to deliver income.

1. The system established should be federally financed and federally administered. (Equity cannot be achieved through state financing; the forces which create the problem of poverty are national in scope and the levels of assistance adopted create implications for the entire Nation.)

2. Levels of cash assistance should be sufficient to meet reasonable standards of adequacy. (The current poverty index of $3553 is two-thirds of the level declared minimally adequate for a non-farm family of four.)

3. Both the working and non-working poor should be covered. (Large numbers of children live in families where parents work all year but are still below the poverty level. Wages have no relation to size of families or cost of living.)

4. Any related work or work-training requirements should guarantee meaningful jobs at wage levels which are not so low as to undermine the goals of minimum wage statutes.

5. Cash assistance should be undergirded by services designed to enhance individual and family functioning, such as day care, family planning, protective services, legal assistance, counseling, vocational rehabilitation, homemaker and consumer education, job training and placement, etc.

6. Provision should be made to allow reasonable exemption of earned income so that individuals and families are not discouraged from seeking to supplement total family cash by working. (Work should be rewarded.)

7. The importance of parenting should be stressed by not requiring mothers with dependent children to work outside the home. The levels of assistance must be high enough for a parent to remain in the home to care for children.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 92d CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

APRIL 6, 1971

Mr. RANGEL (for himself, Mrs. CHISHOLM, Mr. CLAY, Mr. COLLINS of Illinois, Mr. CONYERS, Mr. DELLUMS, Mr. DIGGS, Mr. HAWKINS, Mr. METCALFE, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. NIX, Mr. STOKES, Mrs. ABZUG, Mr. BADILLO, Mr. HALPERN, Mr. HECHLER of West Virginia, Mr. MINVA, Mr. PRICE of Illinois, Mr. ROSENTHAL, Mr. ROYBAL, and Mr. RYAN), introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means

H. R. 7257

A GUARANTEED ADEQUATE INCOME FOR EVERY AMERICAN

Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to assure a guaranteed adequate income for every American.

I am recommending that the present welfare system be replaced by a guaranteed adequate income system and that any welfare reform which fails to establish a time table for reaching income adequacy be opposed. A guaranteed adequate income system must assure a minimum of $6,500 a year for a family of four from this new plan, wages or both.

I am proposing a $6,500 minimum for the following reasons:

A. The minimum a family of four needs is $3,500 to live at a minimum standard of health and decency. This figure is based on studies conducted by the Bureau of Labor Statistics that show what a family of four actually spends to get by at a low standard of living.

B. Studies conducted by the Department of Agriculture show that lesser amounts including the so-called poverty level are totally adequate as a measure of what people need to live.

C. Jobs available to people without high school and extensive technical education do not provide an income sufficient to meet people's needs, and this income must be supplemented.

D. This country has the resources available to provide this minimum level of health and decency to all Americans. A guaranteed adequate income would initially cost only five percent of the gross national product. By putting substantial amounts in the hands of poor people the country would assure itself of considerable economic growth because poor people will pour their income right back into the economy.

A recent Gallup poll reports that the American public believes the smallest amount a family of four needs to make ends meet is $126 a week. Earnings of $126 a week is $6,552 a year.

The bill represents the structure and procedures recommended by the National Welfare Rights Organization. This group, with 200 affiliates in 50 States, is an organization of welfare recipients and other poor people. The group speaks for those who know first hand the deficiencies and frustrations of the present systems. The time has come for America to solve the welfare crisis and that time is now.

THE ADEQUATE INCOME ACT OF 1971. HR 7257

THE NEW YORK TIMES, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 7, 1971

20 in House Seek Welfare Plan Giving $6,500 to a Family of 4

By WARREN WEAVER, JR.
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, April 6 — A welfare program that would guarantee a family of four an annual income of $6,500 was proposed today by 20 members of the House, including a dozen blacks and one Republican.

The new plan, supported by the National Welfare Rights Organization, would continue paying Federal benefits to a family until its total income reached $11,000 a year and would add between $50-billion and $60-billion to the budget in its first year of operation.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of Manhattan, told a news conference that the Nixon Administration's welfare reform plan and the bill approved tentatively by the House Ways and Means Committee would "mean a return to the dark ages."

Both these programs would provide a Federal floor of $2,400 a year for a family of four. They would not, however, require states that now maintain higher benefit levels to contique them or provide any more Federal money to help those that chose to do so.

It appeared unlikely that Congress would approve anything approaching a $6,500 benefit level, but the introduction of what was called the Adequate Income Act of 1971 might help House liberals in their campaign to increase the Federal welfare investment in the Ways and Means bill.

George A. Wiley, executive director of the National Welfare Rights Organization, predicted that the sponsors of the new measure would vote against the committee's bill on the floor if its income floor were not raised from $2,400 to $6,500.

Representative Parren J. Mitchell, Democrat of Maryland, said that he was inclined to vote against the Ways and Means bill but circumstances could change. Mr. Rangel said that it would create "a very serious problem" if the House had no choice except the plan of Representative Wilbur D. Mills, the committee chairman, or no welfare reform at all.

Representative Bella S. Abzug, Democrat of Manhattan, said that the country had spent "billions on welfare for the wealthy in the form of oil depletion allowances, tax loopholes for millionares and farm subsidies to the undeserving."

Members of the Black Congressional Caucus cosponsoring the welfare bill, in addition to Representatives Rangel and Mitchell, are Shirley Chisholm of Brooklyn, William L. Clay of Missouri, George W. Collins and Ralph H. Metcalfe of Illinois, John Conyers Jr. and Charles C. Diggs Jr., of Michigan, Ronald V. Dellums and Augustus F. Hawkins of California, Louis Stokes of Ohio and Robert N. C. Nix of Pennsylvania. All are Democrats.

The sole Republican sponsor is Seymour Halpern of Queens. Other Democratic sponsors besides Mrs. Abzug are Herman Badillo of Manhattan-Bronx-Queens; Benjamin S. Rosenthal of Queens, and William F. Ryan of Manhattan, Ken Hechler of West Virginia, Abner J. Mikva and Melvin Price of Illinois and Edward R. Roybal of California.

WELFARE: PROPOSED CHANGES FACE STIFF OPPOSITION

Under the pressure of rising welfare costs and caseloads, the House appears ready to give President Nixon a new welfare system. He first proposed such a move in August 1969.

The legislation may bear little resemblance, however, to the Administration's original Family Assistance Plan.

The House Ways and Means Committee hopes to approve by the end of April a bill which retains the Administration's guaranteed annual federal benefit for poor families and coverage for the working poor.

But the bill tentatively set a higher benefit level ($2,400) than the original Administration recommendation ($1,600). It called for greater federalization of the system and eases requirements for state spending on welfare.

The new program could cost the federal government $2.8-billion more than it expected to spend on welfare in fiscal 1972.

States pressed by soaring welfare budgets could save from $2.1-billion to $2.5-billion. But if the states add to the federal payment to ensure that no welfare recipient gets less money than he currently is receiving, the state savings could shrink to $1.7-billion.

The Administration was expected to accept the package. In his January 1971 State of the Union message, President Nixon listed welfare reform as one of his "six great goals" for action by the 92nd Congress.

The ranking Republican on the Ways and Means Committee, John W. Byrnes (Wis.), told Congressional Quarterly he believed President Nixon was satisfied with the plan. The bill was in the "basic framework" of the President's recommendations, Byrnes said.

Even with Administration support, the committee bill faced roadblocks in Congress.

House opponents of the proposal—several of whom are members of Ways and Means—argued that the poor in 45 states would get less help, not more. This could happen, they said, because the proposal does not require states to supplement the $2,400 federal benefit and because food stamps would be eliminated in favor of the higher cash payment. States paying more than $2,400 currently could reduce their own spending by merely passing on to the poor the federal payment, without adding to it.

States with the highest welfare costs would save little money under the committee proposal if they kept benefits up to present levels, opponents said. While Mississippi could have 100 percent of its costs covered by the federal government, they said, New York State would save only about 9 percent.

Another obstacle for the bill was the Senate Finance Committee where the original Family Assistance Plan died at the end of 1970.

Liberals on the Finance Committee argued that $1,600 for a family of four was too low and that the work requirements were too stiff. Conservative committee members said the bill would increase welfare rolls by 12 million persons.

Finance Committee Chairman Russell B. Long (D La.) objected to the bill so strongly that he sent it back to the White House in May for reworking after three days of hearings. He was insistent on tough work requirements, a position he continued to hold in 1971.

Long told Congressional Quarterly he opposed a "guaranteed annual income for not working." The Family Assistance Plan would "undermine the moral fiber of this country," he said.

The Existing System

Public assistance covers four programs for the poor—Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC), Aid to the Blind, Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled and Old-Age Assistance. The last three programs are called the "adult" categories of public assistance.

Each state sets its own standards for the programs and administers them, with the federal government reimbursing the states for their payments. States with low per capita income receive higher federal matching funds than states with high per capita income.

For aid to dependent children, the federal share is five-sixths of the first $18 for each recipient and from 50 percent to 65 percent of the remainder, up to a maximum of $32 per recipient. For the adult categories, the federal share is $31 of the $37 in payments and 50 percent to 65 percent of the remainder.

Another federal-state public assistance program is medical assistance for the needy (Medicaid). The federal share for Medicaid varies from 50 percent to 83 percent. States may choose the Medicaid formula for federal reimbursement for welfare. That formula could give a state more federal dollars if the state paid higher average benefits under Medicaid than under the other programs.

New York State pays $4,032 annually to a family of four with no income, of which the federal share is 50 percent. Mississippi pays $972 to a family of four, with the federal government picking up 83 percent of the cost.

Caseloads. Welfare caseloads have risen sharply in recent years. Two million persons were added to the rolls from February 1970 to November 1970, bringing the total on public assistance to 13.5 million persons.

The largest increases have been in the aid to dependent children program. From October 1970 to November 1970, the increase in the program was 282,000. Total number of persons receiving AFDC payments in November 1970 was 9,390,000, of whom 6,849,000 were children. A year before, the total had been 7,124,000.

State Costs. States and localities (counties and some cities) pay for the non-federal share of public assistance. Many Governors have said their budgets no longer can meet the strain of skyrocketing welfare expenses.

Assumes states maintain present benefit levels.*

Faced with a $1-billion budget deficit, California Gov. Ronald Reagan (R) has tried to cut welfare and Medicaid spending. The state is threatened with the loss of nearly $700-million in federal funds for welfare programs for not meeting provisions in a 1967 federal law calling for increases in benefit levels proportionate to rises in the cost of living.

President Nixon April 2 postponed the cutoff of federal funds to allow California more time to comply with the federal law. But the situation was typical of actions in other states. Indiana and Nebraska faced the loss of federal money when they failed to increase their standards of need for dependent children in relation to rising living costs.

New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) has proposed tightening eligibility for welfare to limit rises in caseloads. He recommended a one-year residency requirement before individuals would be eligible for welfare and a ban on welfare benefits to employable persons unless they were working or in training.

The problems have grown for large cities. A February 1970 survey by the Social and Rehabilitation Service of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare showed that more than 15 percent of the Boston population was on welfare. In New York City, more than 13 percent of the residents were getting welfare checks.

Nationally, 5.7 percent of the population received public assistance payments in February 1970. The rate was 8.6 percent in the central cities or counties in which the central cities are located.

New York City Mayor John Lindsay (R) Feb. 24 filed a lawsuit against the federal and state governments to have mandated welfare costs declared unconstitutional. Under existing law, the city was required to pay $549-million to welfare recipients in fiscal 1971 and $600-million for fiscal 1972. Lindsay said the welfare expenses would bankrupt the city.

House Ways and Means Committee

A crucial factor in the outcome on welfare legislation is the House Ways and Means Committee and its chairman, Wilbur D. Mills (D Ark.). Mills was lukewarm in his support of the Administration's Family Assistance Plan when it first was proposed in 1969.

But after months of deliberation, the committee in March 1970 sent a bill (HR 16311) to the House floor which was similar to the Administration recommendation. Mills said he was concerned about the "runaway growth" in caseloads and costs under the AFDC program.

The bill passed the House April 16, 1970, by a 243-155 roll-call vote.

HR 16311, the Family Assistance Act of 1970, provided a $1,600 annual payment to a family of four with no income and scaled-down benefits to families with income up to $3,920. Recipients were required to register for work or training.

If the $1,600 federal payment was less than families were currently receiving, the states had to add to the federal money to bring the total up to present benefits. The federal government was to contribute 30 percent matching funds for the state supplement.

The bill failed to make it out of the Senate Finance Committee, although it had been revised to meet some of the objections of Senate committee members.

When the 92nd Congress convened, the first bill (HR 1) introduced in the House was a welfare-Social Security package. Sponsored by Mills and John Byrnes, HR 1 offered essentially the same welfare provisions passed by the House in 1970.

But the measure has been rewritten extensively by the committee. Federal benefits for poor families tentatively have been raised to $2,400, with food stamps eliminated. States do not have to supplement the $2,400, but if they do, the federal government will not offer any matching funds for the state share.

The working poor with incomes up to $4,320 would receive scaled-down payments. Persons in the adult welfare programs would be eligible for $150 monthly in the third year of the program; couples, $200. The federal government would gradually take over the total administration of the adult programs. The basic federal benefit for poor families would be handled by the federal government.

Although the bill was expected to clear the Ways and Means Committee after the Easter recess, the committee was divided over many of its features. Opposition came from both sides of the political spectrum.

Hugh L. Carey (D N.Y.) said states should be required to keep benefits at their present level, and future state costs should be limited to the fiscal 1971 totals (a "hold-harmless" clause). Without a hold-harmless provision, Carey argued, the increases in caseloads would eat up state savings.

With a $2,400 federal benefit, "some states would be bailed out, but the high caseload states would be left high and dry," Carey said. The slight relief that the high-cost states would gain, Carey said, would be wiped out within a year or two by rising costs.

Carey proposed two alternatives: have the federal government contribute to amounts paid by the states between $2,400 and the poverty level, or provide that no state need spend more than 90 percent of fiscal 1971 costs.

Carey has threatened to request a roll call on every amendment when the bill comes before the committee for a final vote. "I want to see some of the guys from big states vote on a roll call for this kind of bill," he said.

Another member of the committee who has reservations about the tentative bill is Sam Gibbons (D Fla.). In 1970, Gibbons suggested that Congress convert the food stamp program to cash payments and add the amounts to the family assistance payment.

The idea was accepted by the Administration late in the year. The Administration recommended that the stamps be phased out in favor of a $2,200 cash payment. But the original plan envisioned a $1,600 payment, plus $860 worth of food stamps. If food stamps had been "cashed-out" for a higher payment in 1970, Gibbons said, the total cash payment should have been $2,460.

Taking into consideration the effects of inflation, Gibbons added, the benefit currently should be at least $2,600, rather than the $2,400 in the tentative bill.

Gibbons said welfare recipients should not be required to take jobs paying less than the minimum wage. The committee proposal set a $1.20-an-hour minimum wage.

A committee member, Omar Burleson (D Texas), objected that the bill is "down the road of no return to a guaranteed annual income." Burleson, who voted against the Family Assistance Plan in 1970, said welfare payments would be raised every few years if the plan were accepted.

The federal government should return federal tax dollars to the states equivalent to their welfare costs, Burleson said, and leave the program to the states to run.

Committee opponents of the bill doubted that they had enough votes to change it substantially before it goes to the House floor.

"I don't think there are six people on that committee who think that poor people are getting a setback in this bill," said James C. Corman (D Calif.).

"Welfare reform should mean fewer hungry people," Corman said. "I'm afraid we are going to leave much of that decision to the states." The most he could hope for, Corman said, was that the committee would provide federal matching funds as incentives to states to raise benefits up to existing levels or the poverty standard (about $3,700).

Other House Proposals

The Ways and Means Committee bill is scheduled to go before the House under a closed rule which means that no amendments can be offered. Mills has used the procedure in the past, and committee members said they were sure it would be done with HR 1.

Despite their slim chance for substituting other proposals or amending HR 1, other House members have introduced welfare legislation. The bills and other House actions include:

REACH. A member of the Ways and Means Committee, Al Ullman (D Ore.) has offered his own welfare plan, the Rehabilitation and Employment Assistance and Child Care Act (HR 6004). Ullman said his bill would provide "all the necessary services and incentives to get people off the welfare rolls and into meaningful jobs."

The major feature of the Ullman bill is the classification of welfare applicants into employable and unemployable. Those judged able to work by the Department of Labor would be placed in jobs or training. They would not receive welfare but, if in training, would get a training allowance based on 40 percent of the average wage in the state and training expenses. The unemployable would receive public assistance.

The bill would establish a Federal Child Care Corporation to operate a 100-percent federally financed child care program and would create 200,000 new public service jobs.

The fundamental idea of his bill, Ullman said, was to split welfare applicants into the two categories of those who could work and those who could not and make training or job placement of the employable a federal responsibility.

"You can't go both ways at once," Ullman said, "You can't go the route of cash payments and still get people back to work. We don't have the resources for both at once."

Adequate Income Act of 1971 (HR 6729). Eleven members of the Black Caucus, led by Charles B. Rangel (D N.Y.), introduced HR 6729 on April 6. The plan to provide an annual payment of $6,500 to poor families was sponsored by the National Welfare Rights Organization. The welfare rights group proposed a $5,500 benefit in 1970 but raised the figure to $6,500 to reflect increases in the cost of living, it said.

Under the bill, eligibility would be based solely on need, participants in the plan would be able to retain one-third of earned income and still receive payments, and a family would be eligible for benefits until income reached slightly under $10,000.

Opposition to Committee Bill. Thirty-one members of the House (four Republicans, 27 Democrats) signed an April 1 letter to Mills expressing concern with the lack of a requirement that states supplement the $2,400 benefit.

"This plan, in our opinion, provides inadequate financial relief for high benefit states," the members said. The 31 members asked that the bill:

- Provide federal support for state efforts to supplement the basic federal assistance payment.
- Guarantee that states not be required to spend more than current spending for family assistance.
- Guarantee that recipients be protected against cuts in benefits.

Senate Action

"The House sent us a basically bad bill" in 1970, Sen. Long told Congressional Quarterly. Long said he saw little difference between the 1970 bill and the latest proposal coming out of the Ways and Means Committee.

"If they don't send us a better one this year, I'm going to fight it," he said.

Long argued that if Congress accepted the Family Assistance Plan the benefits eventually would have to rise to the poverty level and as many as 59 million persons would be eligible for welfare. With benefits at that level, he said, the added cost to the federal government would be $30-billion.

The Finance Committee would be willing to spend "a lot more money on the poor if we're moving in the right direction," Long said. "I'm willing to help anyone who cannot work and help them generously."

Long objected, however, to welfare payments for persons who can work. About 95 percent of the children in the aid to dependent children program have fathers capable of supporting them, he said. "I'd always feed those children and find some way to care for them," he said. "But the starting point is to find their fathers." Fathers who desert their families or will not support them should have their wages garnished to provide money for their families, he said.

The work requirements in the 1970 bill were "mere window-dressing," Long said, put in the bill "for the purpose of misleading moderates and conservatives" who wanted a strong work requirement.

Long charged that the Administration approach was to put a man on welfare, "then urge him to work and then give him 1,000 excuses not to." One way to solve the welfare problem, he said, would be to provide emergency assistance and a sustenance program for people unable to work and to subsidize the working poor.

"I'm in favor of making work more attractive than welfare," Long said.

He has set no dates for hearings on welfare legislation. He was waiting, he said, for the House committee to finish work on its bill. ✓

WELFARE: HEAVY LOBBYING FOR CHANGE IN COSTLY SYSTEM

Advocates of changing the nation's welfare system are trying to work out a common strategy to get a bill through the 92nd Congress. Their problem is how to compromise on what they all want in the bill.

About 20 organizations have been meeting together since December 1970 in a loosely knit coalition. Their aim is to prevent a repeat of 1970 when the Administration's Family Assistance Plan (FAP) and other welfare proposals stalled in the Senate in the 91st Congress.

The organizations all believe that the $10-billion welfare system needs overhauling. Most agree that the President's proposal for a guaranteed minimum income for poor families moves in the right direction.

The leading opponent of the Family Assistance Plan is the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The chamber, which objects to the guaranteed minimum income concept, does not work with the coalition.

The coalition includes such widely diverse groups as the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Welfare Rights Organization.

Each organization has its own major goal. They admit that their different objectives may hamper their effectiveness as a working coalition.

The National Welfare Rights Organization is fighting for a $6,500 minimum income for poor families. The AFL-CIO insists that welfare recipients be paid at least $1.60 an hour and be given suitable protections if they are required to take jobs. States, counties and cities are looking for relief from skyrocketing welfare budgets.

Pressure is building from some of the groups for federalization of the welfare system.

Despite their objections to different features of the Family Assistance Plan, the organizations want a welfare bill passed in the 92nd Congress. They believe political pressure for change is so strong that Congress will have to act.

The Family Assistance Plan guarantees a minimum annual income of $1,600 for poor families and includes the working poor in the benefit system. Welfare recipients would be required to take jobs or training to be eligible for the payments.

The Administration bill passed the House April 16, 1970, by a 243-155 roll-call vote. But it ran into trouble in the Senate Finance Committee where it was opposed by both liberals and conservatives. The liberals wanted higher benefit levels and protection for recipients against stringent work requirements. Conservatives argued that the work incentives and work requirements were not strong enough. They said that 12 million persons could be added to welfare rolls by including the working poor in the program.

The battle is being re-fought in 1971. The House Ways and Means Committee has been holding closed-door sessions since January on a revised version of the Administration's Family Assistance Plan (HR 1).

The Coalition

Welfare change supporters hope they can help prevent a recurrence of the 1970 action. "There wasn't a group out there working," when the bill was before the Senate, said Ralph Tabor of the National Association of Counties (NACO). Many of the organizations were going their own way.

NACO decided enough groups had a mutual interest in getting a bill passed for them to be able to work together.

"We learned a lot last year," Tabor said. "Now we know better where our efforts have to be directed."

The National Association of Counties, the National Governors Conference and the National League of Cities-U.S. Conference of Mayors had occasional meetings. Then NACO took the lead in calling together about 10 groups to meet weekly. Their aim: to pool intelligence about their positions and their activities.

The list of organizations grew as the initial 10 suggested other groups which might be interested in attending or the groups themselves contacted NACO when they heard about the meetings. Close to 20 organizations now send representatives from time to time to the meetings.

The groups attending include: Common Cause (successor to the Urban Coalition Action Council), National League of Cities, National Governors Conference, National Welfare Rights Organization, AFL-CIO, League of Women Voters, National Rehabilitation Association, National Association of Social Workers, American Jewish Committee, Goodwill Industries, National Assembly for Social Policy and Development, National Conference of Catholic Charities, National Association of Manufacturers, American Vocational Association, Center for Community Change, Committee for Economic Development, American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees and American Public Welfare Association.

One major participant in the meetings is John Montgomery, assistant to the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) and director of the HEW Family Planning Assistance Office. Montgomery briefs the group on developments within the Administration and on Capitol Hill.

The reception to Administration proposals on the bill is not always friendly. One HEW official said, "You think when you go to these meetings, that it's sure nice to be among friends. Then the next time, you get cut to pieces."

Wait and See

Tabor said the group was waiting to see what kind of bill was reported by the House Ways and Means Committee before deciding whether the organizations could agree on what they wanted. The groups want to see what the bill will contain.

"Right now each organization is trundling its own buggy," said Joseph Parks, an HEW assistant to Montgomery. "As long as the bill is in committee, there is really no possibility of developing a common strategy."

"We'll strive to improve whatever comes out of Ways and Means," said Common Cause official Jack Moskowitz.

Lobbyists for the organizations are quick to point out that their impact on what kind of bill emerges may be limited and that their efforts are directed as much to the public and their memberships as to Congress.

Moskowitz said the broad aim of Common Cause was to provide the public with enough information on the legislation to mobilize nationwide support for welfare change. Common Cause has been trying to organize its members in congressional districts so that they can make their views known to their Representatives.

"Our attitude is that aside from bringing together experts and exchanging information, our efforts with Congress may be limited," Moskowitz said.

Work Requirement

Other groups could be more effective, he said, on those points in the bill which directly affected the interests of their memberships. He cited as an example the concern of the AFL-CIO and other labor groups over the work requirements in the bill. Welfare recipients would be required to take jobs or training or lose their benefits.

Labor groups believe their pressure helped convince the Ways and Means Committee to include "suitable work" provisions in the 1970 bill, similar to those in the Federal Unemployment Tax Act. Job assignments would have to take account of such elements of suitability as the degree of risk to the individual's health and safety, his physical fitness for the work, prior training, length of unemployment and distance from work.

The "suitability" clause was dropped from the bill on the House floor. "We were shocked when the House of Representatives deleted the requirement," Andrew J. Biemiller of the AFL-CIO told the Senate Finance Committee in August 1970. "The lack of protection for welfare recipients evidences a callous disregard of the welfare and dignity of persons who will have to depend on family assistance," he said.

At its annual conference on February 15, 1971, the AFL-CIO executive council said the Administration's bill needed "substantial improvement" before the AFL-CIO could support its enactment. The council said a new welfare program should provide a national minimum welfare payment of no less than the government-defined poverty level ($3,800 for an urban family of four).

Other objectives include job protection and minimum wage guarantees. "Requiring welfare recipients to take jobs below the Fair Labor Standards Act rate will make it all the more difficult for employed family heads now working at jobs paying substandard wages to improve their incomes," the executive council said.

An AFL-CIO spokesman said the union sought protection for state welfare office personnel who would be in danger of losing their jobs if the federal government assumed responsibility for the administration of welfare in every state.

Rising Welfare Caseloads

With welfare rolls rising by 200,000 persons a month, the impetus for changing the system is strong. The large welfare increase is in the Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) program which would be replaced by the Family Assistance Plan. The AFDC program showed a one-month increase of 282,000 persons from October 1970 to November 1970. It was a record increase—40,000 higher than the September-to-October increase.

The total number of persons receiving AFDC payments currently is estimated at 9.4 million. Including persons receiving assistance under three other so-called "adult categories"—Aid to the Blind, Old-Age Assistance and Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled—the total reaches about 12.2 million persons.

Since the President proposed his plan in August 1969, three million additional persons have started receiving welfare payments. The annual cost has risen by $1.7-billion.

Estimates for fiscal 1972 welfare spending total $10.3-billion for all the programs, with the state and local share expected to be $4.5-billion of the total.

In his January 1971 State of the Union message, President Nixon called the welfare system "a monstrous consuming outrage" for both the taxpayer and the welfare recipient. He placed welfare change high on his list of must legislation for the 92nd Congress.

The Opposition

When the President unveiled his Family Assistance Plan, many major organizations acclaimed its two principle features—a federally guaranteed minimum income and assistance for the working poor. Citizen, labor, civil rights and public interest groups argued that the $1,600 benefit level was too low, but they applauded many of the concepts in the plan.

One major exception was the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The chamber objected that the plan would increase welfare rolls to almost 24 million persons.

"Adding 14 million more people to the relief rolls and guaranteeing a minimum family income," said chamber vice president Arch N. Booth, "is not the way to clean up the monumental welfare mess."

Chamber officials said the organization supported some features of the Family Assistance Plan. "One of our most serious disagreements is bringing in the working poor."

Congressional action committees were formed by the chamber in congressional districts. The chamber encouraged the committee members to let their Representatives know their positions on welfare change.

Chamber officials were worried at the beginning of the year that the Ways and Means Committee was going to rush a welfare bill to the House floor early in the session. The chamber wanted the committee to hold public hearings on the welfare provisions.

"Businessmen have a timely opportunity," a chamber newsletter said in February, "to inform their Representatives of their great concern that the welfare bill may again be pushed through the House hastily without adequate consideration."

Members were urged to contact their Representatives on the Ways and Means Committee to consider splitting welfare into two issues, one dealing with the problems in the AFDC program and the other with the guaranteed income features of the Family Assistance Plan.

Another move the chamber had been pushing was separation of the Social Security provisions of HR 1 from the welfare plan.

Supporters of welfare change were not so sure they wanted the two split off from each other. They speculated that welfare reform had a better chance of passing with the help of the more popular Social Security benefit increases.

Another group which expressed early opposition to Family Assistance was the American Conservative Union. The proposal would make "welfare more comfortable when it should be made less comfortable—(and) more respectable, more of a 'right' when it should be made less of a 'right,'" the organization said.

Other Objections

Lobbying from other groups on the measure began to build up slowly. Objections to features of the bill began to appear during fall 1969 hearings by the House Ways and Means Committee.

Bernard F. Hillenbrand, executive director of the National Association of Counties, complained that while counties were "the cutting edge of social problems," the Administration proposal gave no recognition to "the county crisis in welfare." He said clarification of the Administration proposal was badly needed.

Ozzie Edwards, president of the National Federation of Social Service Employees, said the plan was based on work, but most poor were unable to work. He said the proposal purported to be a means of strengthening families but that it forced mothers to leave their children for training or jobs.

New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R), testifying for the National Governors Conference, praised the President's bill as possibly "the most significant federal domestic legislation put forth in a generation." But he said the welfare program ought to become 100 percent federally financed within three to five years.

The bill went to the House floor April 16, 1970, under a closed rule which prevented any amendments from being offered. The next target of the lobbyists was the Senate.

Administration Lobbying

Apart from the National Welfare Rights Organization which claimed it "zapped FAP" at the end of 1970, the welfare lobbyists said much of the battle for the bill was fought out between the Administration and Senate liberals.

Many welfare change supporters believe the Administration was inept in its own lobbying by trying to win over Senate conservatives who were not going to support the bill anyway. At the same time, the Administration was losing liberal Senators who would have worked for the bill, the lobbyists said, if the Administration had agreed to some of their proposals.

Common Cause official Moskowitz said, "1970 was the time to pass the bill, but everything fell apart. The Administration confused everyone.

"The Administration has a political problem," Moskowitz said. "They're proposing a bill which many members of their own party hate."

Common Cause called a Dec. 3, 1970, meeting of businessmen, church groups and others supporting welfare change to meet with HEW Secretary Elliot Richardson. About 200 persons attended, Moskowitz said. At that meeting, Richardson announced Administration acceptance of seven out of 10 amendments to the Administration bill proposed by Sen. Abraham A. Ribicoff (D Conn.) and Wallace F. Bennett (R Utah).

The Ribicoff-Bennett compromise never came to a vote when the Senate got into a parliamentary filibuster over a bill which contained some welfare provisions as well as import quotas and Social Security increases.

The bill provided for only a limited testing of the Family Assistance Plan with no date set for implementing the program nationwide. The Senate Finance Committee had had the Family Assistance Plan under consideration for almost seven months before rejecting it by a 10-6 committee vote on Nov. 20.

Two days before the vote, Eugene J. McCarthy (D Minn.—House 1949-59; Senate 1959-1970), a member of the Finance Committee, held his special hearing on the bill. The hearing was to allow welfare recipients to air their complaints about the bill, he said. The National Welfare Rights Organization said the Finance Committee had not allowed it to testify before the regularly scheduled hearings of the committee.

"No one in a position to vote on FAP had ever had a chance to hear what recipients thought of it," the welfare rights organization said.

Attending the special hearing were 23 welfare rights members, more than 300 welfare recipients, 10 Senators and representatives of the American Indian Organization, American Friends Service Committee, National Committee on Household Employment, National Urban League and other organizations.

The special hearings were "the major factor influencing the Senate Finance Committee to vote to kill the FAP the next day," the welfare rights organization claimed.

Not all of the welfare rights group's activities were welcomed by the other groups fighting for welfare change. One lobbyist said the organization had been destructive when the Administration was trying to win the support of Senate liberals at the end of 1970. Some of the organizations think the welfare group's demands were excessive; Congress will never accept a $6,500-benefit level or even $5,500, they reason.

The National Welfare Rights Organization is one of the youngest and most militant of the groups fighting for welfare change. Organized in the summer of 1967, the group has 125,000 members in 400 local affiliates in 48 states.

George A. Wiley, executive director of the organization, Feb. 15 denounced the Administration bill as "repressive." The bill would force mothers to work at "slave wage jobs," he said.

"People who think that Family Assistance is a foot in the door to welfare reform are being misled," Wiley said. If the bill passed, Wiley said, the non-working poor would never get grants raised to an adequate level, and the working poor would have their jobs undermined "because the forced work provisions without wage protections" would create a large supply of cheap labor.

Although the welfare rights group insists it wants the Family Assistance Plan defeated, the group participates in the meetings called by the National Association of Counties.

"We want to spend time with anyone willing to listen to our position," said one organization staff member. He said the organization wanted other groups, members of Congress and the public to understand their objections to the bill. Grants would be cut for 450,000 families, a welfare rights official said, and minimum wage protection would not be provided. The bill provides too little money for too few people, he said.

Federalizing Welfare

"I'm perfectly willing to have the government take over most if not all of the cost of welfare programs," said Ways and Means Committee Chairman Wilbur D. Mills (D Ark.) in an interview in the March 15 U.S. News and World Report. Mills said he would have no objection to a plan for the federal government to assume the cost of the three adult welfare programs.

Under the Family Assistance Plan, the basic $1,600 would be financed 100 percent by the federal government, but states would be required to supplement the payment so that no recipient received less than he was currently receiving.

Federalization of welfare administration and expenses is not a new idea but one which has gained currency in 1971. It may become a central issue in the 1971 welfare debate. Mills is reported to view the proposal as an alternative to the President's proposed $5-billion general revenue-sharing plan which he opposes. States and localities would be given fiscal relief for their hard-pressed budgets.

Under the existing system, the federal government pays from 50 percent to 70 percent of public assistance. The percentage of federal funds depends on state per capita income. The poorer the state, the higher the federal assistance.

The National Governors Conference has been on record since 1969 for substitution, on a phased basis, of a federally financed system of welfare payments for the current federal-state program for the adult category programs and AFDC. The governors conference proposed that eligibility and grants be determined by the federal government, with the system administered under federal guidelines.

The AFL-CIO advocates having the federal government both administer the system and pay all the costs. "Federalization of the welfare program should be achieved as quickly as possible," said the AFL-CIO executive council in February.

The most recent proposal on federalizing welfare has come from the Center for Community Change, an organization established to aid local groups of poor people. The center circulated a memorandum to the Ways and Means Committee and outside organizations proposing a single federal system of benefits with uniform national eligibility standards. Staging of federal takeover of welfare costs would begin on July 1, 1972, with the government providing $2,450 and working up to 100 percent federal financing at the poverty level by July 1, 1976.

Common Cause, the United Auto Workers and the AFL-CIO endorsed a similar plan on March 9. Common Cause and the Center for Community Change have close links. Jack T. Conway, president of the center since December 1968, was named president of Common Cause on March 2. ✓

LOBBY PROPOSAL CRITICIZED

A proposed new lobby registration measure sponsored by leaders of the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct was criticized March 16 as providing overkill and possibly infringing on constitutional rights.

The criticism came from George B. Mickum III on behalf of the Bar Association of the District of Columbia. He was one of several witnesses at a one-day hearing on the bill (HR 5259) cosponsored by Chairman Melvin Price (D Ill.) and ranking Republican Jackson E. Betts of Ohio. A scheduled second day was canceled in the absence of further requests to appear. Price said hearings may resume later. (1970 Weekly Report p. 2576)

Other witnesses included W. Pat Jennings, Clerk of the House. He repeated his earlier position that any change in the lobby law should retain the administration of the law in his office and in that of the Secretary of the Senate, keeping "the regulation of lobbying under the full control of Congress." Jennings recommended a two-year limitation on public inspection of lobby registration reports—a provision contained in the 1946 law.

The Legislative Activities Disclosure Act introduced by Price and Betts would switch administrative responsibility to the Comptroller General. It would repeal the Federal Regulation of Lobbying Act of 1946 and replace it with what Price called "a completely new body of law."

While Jennings advocated that lobby functions be kept in his office, Comptroller General Elmer B. Staats testified that his office would accept the responsibility but would not seek it. He stipulated that he favored transfer of enforcement to the Comptroller General only under the provision that he would be acting "as an agent for the Congress."

Mickum praised the sponsors' intentions but differed with several provisions of the bill. "At times, the bill's requirements seem to us to abridge or suppress basic constitutional rights and, in some of its aspects, we fear that it will impair the ability of Congress to acquire information appropriate to its legislative function," Mickum testified.

He said "some provisions of the bill require much more than the Congress needs to have under its 'right to know' and in imposing formidable burdens of record-keeping, reporting, and filing statements may be inconsistent with the First Amendment...."

Mickum said the bill contained ambiguities and loopholes. He questioned some of the definitions of who should be covered. He said in some cases the bill seemed to include too many people while in others it left out persons who should be covered.

"Under the bill," Mickum said, "any person 'who effects the solicitation, orally or in writing, of other persons or groups of persons to influence legislation' is subject to the bill." This might mean that demonstrators, for example, were required to register, he said. ✓

WELFARE REFORM: DISAPPOINTMENT FOR THE ADMINISTRATION

President Nixon's major welfare reform proposal—the Family Assistance Plan—died in the Senate in 1970 after it was caught in controversy between liberals and conservatives on the Senate Finance Committee.

The impasse was cited by Mr. Nixon as one of his greatest disappointments in the 91st Congress.

The plan would have guaranteed a Federal payment of $1,600 a year to a family of four with no income. Families with earnings—the so-called "working poor"—also would have been eligible for payments, but on a decreasing scale, until the earnings reached $3,920 a year.

To be eligible for the payments, the head of the family had to register for work or training. States were expected to save on their mounting welfare costs because of the guaranteed Federal floor of $1,600.

After easy passage in the House in April, the measure stalled in the Senate Finance Committee. Many liberals on the Committee complained that the benefit payments in the bill were too low and its work requirements too harsh, while conservatives argued that the plan was too costly.

The Committee Nov. 20 by a 10-6 vote rejected the plan and approved only a limited test run of the proposal. An effort was made on the Senate floor in December to substitute a compromise version of the original Administration bill which was acceptable to liberals. But welfare reform had been tied by the Senate Finance Committee into a conglomerate bill (HR 17550) with Social Security and foreign trade provisions. (p. 1042, 1051)

The bill was filibustered for the last two weeks of December by opponents of the trade provisions and supporters of the compromise Family Assistance proposal who wanted to block passage of the Committee's test run provisions. After it became apparent that no agreement could be reached on the conglomerate bill in the last days of the session, the bill was dropped for the 91st session.

When the plan was proposed by the President in a nationally-televised statement in August 1969, it was widely acclaimed as a new approach to welfare. The existing welfare system with spiraling costs and increasing numbers of recipients was unpopular with the states and cities which had to administer the programs. Welfare recipients complained of inadequate state benefits and discriminatory treatment. (1969 Almanac p. 833)

President Nixon called his proposal the most significant piece of legislation since enactment of Social Security in 1935 (PL 74-271). By entitling the working poor to benefits, the Family Assistance Plan was expected to add as many as 12 million recipients to welfare rolls. Federal costs could increase by $4.4 billion, the Administration estimated. States were expected to save between 10 percent and 30 percent on their skyrocketing welfare costs.

When the plan was rejected by the Senate Finance Committee, the Administration made a last-ditch effort to save the bill on the Senate floor by agreeing to a set of compromises proposed by Senate liberals. After the Senate failed to act on the bill, the President said enactment of the plan would be his major legislative goal in 1971.

Background

A Nixon task force on public welfare recommended to the President-elect on January 12, 1969, that major changes be made in the welfare system. The nine-man task force, headed by Richard P. Nathan of Brookings Institution, called for the Federal Government to assume a much greater share of welfare costs and to impose national minimum standards of payments to the poor. (1969 Almanac p. 833)

Although the Administration was reported to be readying a bill for Congress that spring, the actual proposal was not made by the President until Aug. 8 and a draft bill did not go to Capitol Hill until early October, 1969. (Text of Nixon message, 1969 Almanac p. 69-A, 75-A)

Momentum for reform had been building for years as the number of welfare recipients climbed higher and higher. Welfare costs, which were shared by local and state governments and the Federal Government, had soared as the number of recipients increased.

It took 25 years—from 1935 to 1960—for the Aid to Dependent Children program to reach the billion-dollar mark in cost. But in only seven more years, the program was costing an additional billion dollars. In 1968 alone, benefit costs rose by another half-billion dollars. (Congress and the Nation Vol. I p. 1225; Congress and the Nation Vol. II, p. 745)

Public assistance programs provided aid to the blind, physically disabled, elderly poor and families with dependent children. Medical assistance for the needy was also provided through Medicaid. In addition, many states offered other types of welfare for which there was no Federal reimbursement—a category of aid called "general assistance."

All the programs operated in the same basic matter, except for general assistance. The states made monthly cash payments to eligible indigent persons, and the Federal Government reimbursed the states for part of their costs.

The Federal share was based on the average monthly payment in each state.

Changes had been made periodically in the Federal-state formulas for public assistance programs, with the Federal share increasing each time. In 1958, a partial sliding scale for matching was adopted, which varied the Federal reimbursement from state to state in accordance with each state's per-capita income. States with per-capita income lower than the national average received more favorable matching than state with per-capita income higher than the national average.

Under the old-age, blind and disabled programs, the Federal share in 1970 was $31 of the first $37 in payments. The Federal Government also paid 50 to 65 percent of the remaining state cost, with the percentage depending on state per-capita income. The lower the income, the higher the percentage paid by the Federal Government.

For Aid to Dependent Children, the Federal share was five-sixths of the first $18 for each recipient and 50 to 65 percent of the balance, with the percentage again depending on state per-capita income. The maximum Federal share for each recipient was $32.

Although the term "welfare" actually covered all the programs mentioned above, the program which had sparked the drive for action was Aid to Dependent Children. In 1958, this program cost a total of $815 million: the figure had climbed to $4.3 billion in 1969.

The cost was high because the number of persons participating in the program kept rising. From 1949 to 1959, the increase in recipients was one million; from 1959 to 1969, the increase was four million. In December 1969, 7.3 million persons—one or both parents and their children—were receiving such aid.

State welfare expenses. States and cities in 1970 were desperate for Federal help in meeting their welfare costs.

Under formulas in the Aid to Dependent Children program, they were receiving from 50-percent to 65-percent reimbursement from the Federal Government for welfare, based on the average payment per recipient in the state.

The highest average monthly payment per recipient in June 1970 was $73.30 in Minnesota for a family of four; $257.25 in Massachusetts. In Massachusetts, a single recipient of welfare received an average monthly payment of $70.85, second only to Minnesota in highest payments.

The South would have benefitted far more than any other region from the President's plan. Administration officials said that 50 percent of the families which would have come under Family Assistance would have been in the South. It was possible that, based on 1960 Census income figures, half of the population of Mississippi would have been eligible for welfare with the $3,920 cutoff figure in the Nixon plan.

An example from Tunica County in the Mississippi Delta demonstrated what the impact of the President's plan could have been in low-income southern areas.

According to 1960 census figures, Tunica County had a median family income of $1,260 which made it the poorest county in the United States. Of the county's 3,469 families, approximately 1,500 had incomes of less than $1,000 and, therefore, would have been eligible for the Federal minimum $1,600 Family Assistance payment.

But since families with incomes up to $3,920 would also have been eligible under Family Assistance to receive a portion of the $1,600 reduced by a percentage of their income, another 1,000 families in Tunica County could have become eligible. Thus, a total of about 2,500 families or more than three-fourths of the county population could have been eligible on the basis of income for Family Assistance payments of $1,600 or less.

In New York State, a welfare family with no income which in 1970 received $264.15 a month could not have expected any higher payment from the Nixon plan. The state was expected, however, to save at least 10 percent of its costs with the help of Family Assistance.

This saving was not enough, argued New York Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller (R) and New York City Mayor John V. Lindsay (R). Welfare was the largest part of the budget in the city. In October 1970, there were 1,140,965 persons on welfare in New York City—one-seventh of the entire city population. The welfare caseload in New York City represented almost 10 percent of the entire caseload in the country—estimated at about 12.2 million in June 1970.

A September 1969 Federal report on the New York City welfare problem warned of even greater increases in welfare within the next five years. One of its projec-

COMING REVOLUTION IN WELFARE

A complete new approach to welfare is on its way through Congress. If the design holds, relief rolls will be opened to almost 26 million Americans.

A vast expansion of the "welfare state" in America is charted in a huge Social Security-public assistance-medicare-medicaid bill moving in Congress.

The 688-page bill—known as H.R. 1—is aimed by its sponsors at shifting more of the burden of welfare costs from States to the Federal Government, and at reducing relief rolls over the long haul through job training and work-registration requirements.

But immediate effects of the legislation would be to:

- Almost double the number of people eligible for welfare; about 26 million, including the "working poor," could qualify for cash payments. That would be 1 out of every 8 Americans.
- Establish—for the first time—the principle of a guaranteed annual income, paid by the Government to every poor family with children.
- Boost Social Security benefits by 5 per cent, the third hike within 2½ years, for an over-all rise of 33 per cent in old-age pensions.
- Raise payroll taxes on the working class by 56 per cent, or more, in the next four years—and higher in years to come—to pay for bigger Social Security and medicare benefits.
- Increase the cost of the total social-welfare package to federal taxpayers by nearly 12 billion dollars over current law in the first year the bill takes effect, and as much as 16.6 billion by fiscal 1976—the 12 months ending June 30 of that year.

1ST SESSION

H. R. 1

A BILL

To amend the Social Security Act to provide increases in benefits, improve computation methods, and raise the earnings base under the OASDI program, to make improvements in the medicare, medicaid, and maternal and child health programs with emphasis on improvements in their operating effectiveness, to authorize a family assistance plan providing basic benefits to low-income families with children with incentives for employment and training to improve the capacity for employment of members of such families, to achieve more uniform treatment of recipients under the Federal-State public assistance programs and otherwise improve such programs, and for other purposes.

Welfare explosion. In the background is this: At a time of general prosperity in the U. S.—with a trillion-dollar-a-year national economy—the number of people on the dole today is larger than the combined total on welfare and work relief at the peak of the Depression of the 1930s.

There has been a rapid escalation in welfare costs and case loads since the surge of "Great Society" domestic programs during the Johnson Administration. Welfare "reforms" enacted by Congress in 1962 and 1967 failed to curb the country's relief explosion.

In 1969, President Nixon called for a complete overhaul of the system, including a controversial Family Assistance Plan (FAP) with a guaranteed $1,600-a-year minimum income for a family of four. The House passed the Administration bill, but it bogged down under intense scrutiny in the Senate Finance Committee.

Now the House Ways and Means Committee, headed by Representative Wilbur Mills (Dem.), of Arkansas, has drafted H. R. 1, a substantially revised version, with a $2,400-a-year cash payment for a family of four. A welfare official noted: "This is a richer bill."

The Committee report says:

"The welfare system in the U. S. has been moving toward a state of crisis and chaos—to change its direction will be difficult. The purpose of this bill is to effect that change."

Opposition comes from a number of groups, including the U. S. Chamber of Commerce which is backing a substitute measure by Representative Al Ullman (Dem.), of Oregon. Stressing the "dangers of a guaranteed annual income," Mr. Ullman has warned:

"If we go down this road, you haven't seen anything yet. You open the Treasury to the working poor, and everybody starts playing the game."

The National Welfare Rights Organization—composed of unionized "welfare mothers"—is demanding a $6,500-a-year family income to start. The Administration figures this would cost taxpayers 75 billion dollars a year.

H.R. 1 is slated for a House vote before the end of June. Then it goes to the Senate. In its present form, this landmark legislation would make these changes in existing welfare programs:

Adult programs. Three adult categories of public assistance—aid to the aged, blind and disabled—would be consolidated into a single federal-aid program, effective July 1, 1972.

A new schedule of nationwide benefits, paid entirely by the Federal Government, would be established, with these cash payments:

Individuals—$130 a month beginning July 1, 1972; $140 a month on July 1, 1973, and $150 a month on July 1, 1974.

Couples—$195 a month July 1, 1972, and $200 a month after July 1, 1973.

Under present law, payments vary from State to State. In February, payments to individuals averaged $76.95 a month for the aged, $102.85 a month for the blind, and $96.20 a month for disabled persons. Benefits ranged from a low of $48.55 in South Carolina to a high of $178.75 in Alaska.

With higher federal benefits, the Health, Education and Welfare Department projects a rise in the number of eligibles from 3.1 million on the rolls in February to 6.2 million in the 1973 fiscal year and 7.2 million by 1976.

One HEW analyst observed:

"We will add a whole new bunch of recipients. We will pick up a lot of the Social Security population, whose retirement benefits do not match the welfare payments."

Also, disability rolls have been rising under a relaxed definition of what constitutes "disability" for purposes of getting on relief.

The HEW spokesman explained:

"Drug addicts and alcoholics are considered disabled, and eligible for assistance in some States. All you have to do in New York is to show that you're a drug addict, and you're on relief."

Family programs. The fastest-rising—and most controversial—part of the entire welfare system is that category known as Aid to Families of Dependent Children (AFDC).

Since Mr. Nixon proposed his revolutionary FAP in 1969, the number of AFDC recipients has jumped by 3.4 million to a total of nearly 10 million.

The Committee report on H.R. 1 says: "The AFDC program is now completely out of control." More than 80 per cent of AFDC children are in homes where one parent is missing—usually the father.

The House bill would abolish AFDC, effective July 1, 1972, and replace it with these two new "family programs":

OFP: Welfare and "working poor" families, in which at least one person is found to be employable, would be assigned to the Opportunities for Families Program, run by the Labor Department.

FAP: Families with no potential employables would remain under HEW, in a new agency called Family Assistance Administration.

Benefits. A new schedule of uniform, nationwide benefits—in effect, a guaranteed annual income—would be paid by the Federal Government to all poor families with children.

The "working poor," now excluded from welfare rolls, would become eligible on Jan. 1, 1973. The same benefits would be paid to those enrolled under both OFP and FAP.

Cash payments would be computed on this basis: $800 a year for each of the first two members of a family; $400 each for the next three; $300 each for the next two, and $200 for the eighth member of an eligible family.

At this point, there would be a cut-off in support—no welfare benefits for additional children in a poor family beyond eight members, including the adults.

This would mean a payment for a family of four of $2,400 a year, 50 per cent more than Mr. Nixon's original FAP. However, an $860 food-stamp allowance would be eliminated and converted into the cash payment.

Services. In addition, H.R. 1 provides for extensive services to poor families, including:

- 750 million dollars at the outset to pay for day-care services for 875,000 children, including 50 million dollars a year for construction of child-care facilities with the Federal Government paying 100 per cent of the costs.
- 150 million dollars to start—and higher amounts in subsequent years—for payments to States for foster care of welfare children placed in private homes.
- 800 million dollars to the States for social services to poor families, including family planning, with the Federal Government paying 75 per cent of costs.
- 540 million dollars to create 225,000 new job-training slots for relief recipients, with the Federal Government paying the entire cost.
- 800 million dollars a year to pay for 200,000 "public-service jobs" with State and local governments, or nonprofit organizations. The Federal Government would pay 100 per cent of the wage in the first year, 75 per cent in the second and 50 per cent in the third.
- 100 million dollars for support services, such as minor medical care, transportation and other expenses.

Case load. The Committee report on H.R. 1—based on HEW estimates—shows that 19.4 million people would be eligible for family assistance in the 1973 fiscal year, compared with about 10 million on AFDC rolls in February, 1971.

HEW would screen all applicants before assigning them either to OFP under Labor or FAP at HEW. Of the 19.4 million potential eligibles, HEW estimates:

- 14 million would go to OFP.
- 5.4 million would be under FAP.

Out of the 14 million on OFP, about 7 million are said to be "working poor," those whose earnings do not exceed the proposed federal welfare payments.

Roughly, 70 per cent of those covered by family payments would be children. The number of employable adults is estimated at 2.8 million—1.6 million who head "working poor" families, 1.2 million who head welfare families.

Of families eligible for aid, about 62 per cent would be whites, and 38 per cent nonwhites. In terms of recipients, about one third of the total black population of 22 million in the U. S. would be eligible for income support.

Costs. The Committee estimates that combined federal-State costs of the revised welfare program would run 18.4 billion dollars in the 1973 fiscal year.

In addition, recipients would get about 8 billion dollars in free medical care under the medicaid program, for an over-all cost of 26.4 billion dollars.

Also, States now pay the entire costs of a general-assistance program, running around a billion dollars a year.

Labor program. Government officials acknowledge that H.R. 1 would put the Labor Department in the welfare business in a big way. An additional Assistant Secretary of Labor and staff would be created to handle OFP.

The Department would be required to provide child care, health protection, vocational rehabilitation, family planning, social services, job training and employment opportunities for registrants.

Any applicant found to be potentially employable would have to register for work, job training or vocational rehabilitation as a condition of receiving family-assistance payments.

If an eligible breadwinner failed to register, the family allowance would be reduced by $800, but the rest of the family benefits would not be cut off.

Welfare mothers would be required to work or take job training if their children are over 6 years old, or above the age of 3 beginning in 1974—but only if day-care facilities are available.

The House Committee found that 5 million mothers with children under age 6 are working now, and more than half of all mothers with children aged 6 to 17 are in the labor force. The Committee report said:

"It seemed to your Committee that to require such women to support out of taxes on their earnings those mothers who choose not to work, but to live on public monies, would be inequitable in the extreme."

Children in a welfare family would not be required to register if they are under age 16, or up to age 22 if they are students regularly attending school.

Family members found incapacitated because of drug abuse or alcoholism would be denied benefits, unless they take remedial treatment at Government expense in approved institutions.

Another exemption: any otherwise eligible person who "is needed in the home on a continuous basis because of illness or incapacity of another family member."

To qualify for aid, [illegible] have "countable resources" [illegible] $1,500.

Excluded would be the value, [illegible] "reasonable amount," of a home, [illegible] hold goods, and "other property essential to the family's self-support."

In the case of welfare recipients assigned to work or job training:

- The first $720 in earnings would be "disregarded" as work-related expenses in computing family income for benefit payments. Also, any costs of child care could be deducted.
- Beyond that, the working member of a family could keep $1 out of every $3 earned, up to a specified "breakout point" depending on the size of the family, without losing all welfare benefits. How this would operate is shown in the chart on page 31.

In calculating its earnings, a family could exclude: one third of payments for alimony or child support, money used to pay for child care, aid received on a basis of need from public or private agencies, home produce, student earnings, and funds received for foster care.

- For recipients in job training, there would be a $30-a-month "incentive allowance," on top of the basic family benefit, plus cash payments for necessary costs of transportation and other "similar expenses."

Job-training features are similar to the

WELFARE'S BIGGEST BOOM STILL AHEAD?

If H. R. 1 — a House bill overhauling the welfare system — is enacted into law, in 1973 nearly 1 out of every 8 Americans will be collecting relief payments. Welfare costs by then would be more than five times as big as those of just 12 years earlier.

NOTE: 1973 relief costs exclude number of programs — such as food stamps, child-care centers and job programs — that heretofore have not been counted as welfare. These programs in 1973 would add up to 4.4 billion dollars in cost.

WIN (Work Incentive) program enacted by Congress in 1967. WIN provided a $30 training bonus, plus retained earnings from employment.

The Senate Finance Committee found last year that 25 per cent of the relief recipients referred for job training under WIN dropped out without good cause. Many returned to welfare again. In some States, the Committee said, WIN had a "zero record" in terms of getting people off relief rolls.

A Government official said:

"The WIN program was destroyed by social workers, who referred people for job training only if they considered it 'appropriate.' Under the new bill, no longer will they have this discretion.

"With money for training slots, day-care centers, and strong backing from Congress for practical on-the-job training, we should be able to do better."

Labor force. Business analysts predict that the legislation may have a profound effect on the labor force, income and wage structure in the nation.

The Committee report says that in 22 States the proposed $2,400 federal benefit would mean an increase in relief payments now being made to a family of four. Fifteen of those States are in the South and Border regions.

At the $1,600-a-year level first proposed by the Nixon Administration, the Senate Finance Committee found last year that the number of people eligible for welfare would rise from 5 to 12 per cent of the total population, and that in 16 States more than 15 per cent of the people would be eligible.

Chairman Russell Long (Dem.), of Louisiana, claimed that "one third of the people in Mississippi would be on welfare." How the relief population would be distributed by regions of the country is shown in the chart on page 36.

Millions of workers engaged as domestics, farm laborers, in service trades or as blue-collar workers would be brought up, overnight, to Government-guaranteed income levels which would range from $1,600 a year to $3,600 a year, with fringe benefits.

The chart on this page shows how welfare rolls might rise by States.

Welfare recipients could not be assigned to jobs paying less than three fourths of the federal minimum wage, or $1.20 an hour under present law, and $1.50 an hour if the minimum wage is raised to $2 an hour.

ELFARE REVOLUTION

Those employed in "public service" jobs would have to be paid the full federal or State minimum wage, or the prevailing wage rate in the locality, whichever is higher.

Mr. Mills has urged House Democrats to raise the federal minimum wage to $2 an hour, effective Feb. 1, 1972, in an effort to offset anticipated costs of welfare payments to the "working poor."

Labor Secretary James D. Hodgson opposed such a move, calling it "inflationary." He said it might prompt employers to prune payrolls, or to avoid hiring new workers.

Administration. The Federal Government would take over from States and localities the main burden of handling all applications, eligibility determinations and cash-benefit payments for public assistance.

The adult program would be handled by the Social Security Administration, but payments would be made out of Treasury general revenue, rather than the Social Security trust fund.

Family-assistance payments for both OFP and FAP would be administered by a central disbursing office at HEW.

The Federal Government would bear the full administrative costs of making supplemental payments for States that pay more than the proposed federal standards, and wish to continue to do so.

States would be guaranteed that their share of welfare costs beginning July 1, 1972, would not exceed their total expenditures in the 1971 calendar year, based on benefit levels as of January 1.

This is called the "hold harmless" provision. An official said: "In effect, it transfers to the Federal Government 100 per cent of the costs of any future caseload increases in the welfare program."

HEW calculates that changes in the bill would save States and localities 1.6 billion dollars in the 1973 fiscal year, but would add 5.5 billion to federal costs, rising to 6.0 billion by 1975.

However, Patrick Healy, executive vice president of the National League of Cities, declared:

"Federalization of welfare doesn't do a thing in the way of fiscal relief for most cities."

According to HEW, 27 States pay all of the State-local share of welfare expenditures, while 23 other States share the burden with the counties.

Local case work and social services would continue to be handled by the States and counties, with the Federal Government paying 75 per cent of the cost.

When the Federal Government takes over, a large number of State and local workers who now are handling administrative functions may be added to federal payrolls.

Penalties. Stiff new penalties are contained in the bill, aimed at curbing welfare abuses.

Every welfare recipient would have to file a new application with HEW. Every applicant would be assigned a Social Security number.

Families would have to file quarterly statements of their income. These statements then would be cross-checked by computer against their Social Security files, income tax records and employment reports.

In the case of families, the bill says that "appropriate State law would be used in determining relationships."

In the adult program, the legislation states that "two persons holding themselves out as married in the community . . . would be considered married for the purposes of this program."

The Federal Government would fix regulations regarding proofs and evidence of welfare eligibility and benefits. People committing fraud would be liable to fines or jail sentences.

However, one authority observed:

"Fines are hard to collect—these people on relief are mostly judgment proof. And very few juries will send anyone to jail for cheating on welfare."

Any parent who crosses a State line to avoid child support would be guilty of a federal crime.

States would be required to make a vigorous effort to secure alimony and child support from a father who has deserted or abandoned his family.

The Federal Government would pay 75 per cent of State costs in establishing the paternity of welfare children, and in locating missing parents.

The Federal Government also would be required to recognize any residency requirement, or waiting period for relief, that a State might choose to impose on applicants.

Outlook. Taken all together, the sweeping provisions of H.R. 1 point to a massive expansion of the "welfare state" in the U. S., with a guaranteed annual income for every poor family with children, and a definition of poverty and benefit levels that could be raised at will by any succeeding Congress and Administration.

Welfare Bill

9/15/71

MEMO: No. 10-71
June 16, 1971

TO: Participating Organizations

FROM: Arnold Aronson, Secretary

RE: Social Security and Welfare Reform

H. R. 1: A BOOST FOR SOCIAL SECURITY, A BLOW TO WELFARE REFORM

Although there is a wide range of opinion about many aspects of H.R. 1, the 687-page, omnibus social security and welfare reform bill, Leadership Conference groups that have analyzed the measure agree its welfare provisions are the worst feature in it.

Measured against the consensus on welfare reform that we adopted earlier this year, the welfare provisions, principally Title IV of the bill, fall short in nearly every respect.

Here is how Title IV looks against the yardstick of our four-part consensus:

1. Federal Administration

We Called For:

Elimination of categories and establishment of a unified federally-administered and federally-financed system based solely on need (the job rights of state employees should be fully protected during the transition from state to federal administration).

What the Bill Provides:

H. R. 1 would scrap the present welfare system and substitute two federally-administered programs in its place. But that is the only change we can support. People are still divided up into categories - six of them. Under these divisions, the highest benefits would go to the needy aged, blind and disabled, and to the working poor. There are lower benefits for those families where no one works and to families where no one is employable. In short, the bill keeps distinctions that somehow suggest a blind man deserves more help than a starving child. As the National Assembly for Social Policy and Development observes, "These distinctions are by intention discriminatory and - with respect to concepts of employability - arbitrary. They imply some failure of effort on the part of the family head who does not have gainful employment. Thus no recognition is given to the labor market situation, the contribution of the mother to her own family, the actual availability of supportive community services or the actual budgetary needs of the family. It is highly divisive, inviting competition among the categories...."

For state and local employees who presently administer welfare, there is not a single assurance of any kind that their job rights will be protected, once the federal government takes over administration of the program.

2. Benefit Levels

We Called For:

(a) Minimum benefits for individuals and families beginning at the government-defined poverty level, with appropriate adjustments to meet variations in the cost of living; and (b) federal supplements to assure that benefits are maintained at least up to present assistance levels.

What the Bill Provides:

1. The government-defined poverty level calls for an annual income of between $3600-$3900 for a family of four. H. R. 1 would establish a benefit level of $2400 a year for a family of four. That's less money than 90 per cent of the welfare families get in 45 states and the District of Columbia under the present AFDC (Aid to Families with Dependent Children) program.

2. H.R. 1 does not require any state supplements to make up the difference between $2400 and what most families are now getting. There is a real danger that if they are given an option, states will not choose to supplement and millions of recipients could end up worse off than they are now.

3. There are no adjustments for cost of living increases. In addition:

4. Large families would suffer under the program. A family of 8 would receive $3600 and there would be no increase in benefits for families of larger size.

5. Families whose incomes are close to the poverty level but are not on welfare now and then become unemployed or suddenly lose their incomes would, under certain circumstances, have to wait for months before they could get on welfare.

3. Job Protections

We Called For:

Protections as to both suitability and wage standards on all job or training programs. Wage rates should equal the federal or state minimum or the prevailing rate, whichever is higher.

What the Bill Provides:

1. There are few protections as to suitability and wage standards. A welfare recipient can be forced to take a job not covered by FLSA paying as low as 75 per cent of the highest federal minimum wage or the prevailing wage for the occupation in the area, whichever is higher. If recipients refuse to take the jobs offered they could lose benefits. As Congressmen Carey, Corman, Green and Vanik point out in supplemental views to the report on H. R. 1, "every effort should be made to avoid providing a captive work force to employers who offer jobs at substandard wages or working conditions."

4. Exemptions for Mothers

We Called For:

Exemption of mothers of pre-school and school-aged children from all job or training requirements; establishment of day-care centers with adequate standards and other supplementary services to enable mothers who choose to accept employment to do so.

What the Bill Provides:

Mothers with children over the age of 6 years could be forced to work. Starting in 1974, mothers with children over the age of three could be forced to work. Although federal administrators of the welfare program are authorized to prescribe standards of day care, no such standards are stipulated in the bill and there is no requirement that day care be assured before a work assignment is made.

Clearly, the welfare provisions fall far short of what our organizations have agreed upon as basic reforms.

Complicating Factors:

What complicates any consideration of our position in regard to H. R. 1 is that welfare is only one of the subjects it deals with.

It has other provisions. It provides for increases in social security benefits, improvements in Medicare, changes in the Medicaid system and for income tax exemptions for retirees.

The Medicaid provisions are a mixture of good and bad. Provisions that would increase federal Medicaid matching funds to states by 25 per cent and limit prevailing charges for doctors, hospitals and skilled nursing homes are improvements. However, under other provisions, services available to Medicaid recipients could be cut back and recipients could be forced to pay for benefits they now receive free. States would be allowed to reduce the number of services they offer and those recipients who work would have to pay on medical bills, the entire third of their earnings they are allowed to keep as a work incentive, before they can receive Medicaid benefits.

Improvements in Social Security and Medicare

The social security provisions in the bill would increase cash benefits 5 per cent across the board, effective July 1, 1972 and, with some qualification, benefits would be increased automatically once a year if there is an increase of 3 per cent in the Consumer Price Index.

The Medicare provisions would extend benefits to disabled persons; it would increase benefits somewhat and also the length of a hospital stay.

What Needs to be Done

Clearly the bill needs improvement, particularly in the welfare provisions. Leadership Conference organizations are agreed on that and many are already at work to try and strengthen it. You can help these efforts by writing to your Congressmen and Senators urging them to work for a bill that at least contains the basic reforms set forth in our consensus.

A flood of mail on this will help the efforts of all of those trying to turn H. R. 1 into an effective vehicle for welfare reform.

HELP CREATE 150,000 PUBLIC JOBS

The House-Senate Conference on the Emergency Employment Act of 1971, the bill that would create immediately, hundreds of thousands of public service jobs will probably be underway by the time you get this MEMO.

As we noted in our last MEMO (No. 9-71) the conference will probably report out a good bill and Congress can be expected to pass it. What needs to be done is to persuade President Nixon not to veto it.

The enclosed editorial and news story from the New York Times provides additional background information that we think our organizations will find useful as they address themselves to the task of convincing the President.

What You Can Do

Once more we ask our groups to get in touch with members of Congress, particularly Republican members, and urge them to urge the President not to veto this badly needed bill. Your mayors and governors, officials who know their cities and states, have much to gain from this program, should be asked to send their own pleas to the President. Please try and get state and county Republican leaders to urge the President to sign the bill into law. What is needed is a massive outpouring of concern if this bill is to be enacted.

Public Jobs for the Jobless

The Congressional bill to create public service jobs for the unemployed is a constructive response both to the immediate exigencies of the recession and to the long-term needs of unskilled workers. With nearly five million persons out of work, including many recent veterans of Vietnam, the nation has a moral as well as an economic obligation to take effective action to offset the human consequences of a downswing in the business cycle. The bill, now passed in slightly different versions by both House and Senate, would be at least a modest help because it would subsidize state and local governments in hiring 150,000 workers to fill subprofessional jobs.

For the longer term after this recession has ended, the bill would continue to provide help in districts suffering particularly high unemployment. Every big city has such a district. The changing character of industrial work is doing away with many jobs which used to be done by the unskilled and the poorly educated. At the same time there is a growing need in the public sector to fill jobs such as playground attendant or nurse's aide, but local governments often lack the funds to hire such employes. The bill would build a bridge between the blue-collar unemployed and the public sector.

It is callous to deride such public service jobs as "dead-end, WPA-type" employment, as if the alternative were well-paid careers in private industry. In fact, the alternative is unemployment and the welfare rolls. These public service jobs have their own dignity; they need to be done; they are jobs within the capacity and experience of the worst-off among the jobless—the unskilled and poorly educated who are the core of the chronically unemployed.

It is unfortunate that House Republicans fought this bill and put forward the Administration's revenue-sharing plan in the manpower field as an alternative. There is a good case to be made for the President's desire to regroup and simplify the various manpower programs and to allow state and local governments more leeway in their management. But the Administration proposal is not an alternative or substitute for the 150,000 jobs which this bill would finance.

Rather than contemplate a veto and enmesh this bill in the revenue-sharing controversy, Mr. Nixon would do better to look at the economic realities of a still-depressed economy and at the human necessities of the unemployed. Even without the reinforcement provided by yesterday's official report of a fresh rise in joblessness, those realities and those necessities argue for the approval of this program.

Jobs:

'Help Wanted'—For the Jobless, That Is

The nation's 5 million unemployed found themselves last week to be pawns in a battle over public service jobs that may provide more work for politicians than it does for the jobless.

The House of Representatives passed a Democratic bill to make $5-billion available over four years, the money to be used for new jobs in schools, hospitals, parks, police and fire departments and social service agencies. The bill, an expanded version of one already pushed through the Senate by a top-heavy vote, was enacted in the face of strong Republican warnings of a probable veto. President Nixon vetoed a similar measure last year on the ground that it would lead to dead-end jobs instead of equipping the unemployed for permanent careers.

Re-Established Coalition

Behind this familiar polarization on Capitol Hill was a near-miss on White House-inspired efforts to re-establish the once-dominant coalition of Southern Democrats and Republicans in support of a bypass maneuver. The aim was to kill the Democratic job plan by substituting for it one of the building blocks in the President's floundering program for Federal revenue sharing with the states and cities—a $2.5-billion outlay for local use in manpower training. Part of the money could go for "transitional" public service employment, if that was what the localities wanted.

The G.O.P. hopes for reviving their old alliance with the Dixiecrats stemmed largely from the unhappiness of Southern diehards over a recommendation by the House Education and Labor Committee that the now toothless Equal Employment Opportunity Commission get independent authority to crack down on violators of the Federal law banning race discrimination in jobs. The proposal not only would empower the commission to issue "cease and desist" orders in private industry, but also would broaden its jurisdiction to take in Jim Crow practices in public employment.

Scaring Democrats

The two measures have no direct connection. However, the Republicans were able to capitalize on the Southern disaffection to the point that they threw a scare into the Democratic leadership when the public service job bill was first called up for House action last month under a rule intended to guarantee easy passage. The defection of 45 Democrats from Southern and border states opened the way for overriding the rule and forcing a floor vote on the Nixon revenue-sharing substitute.

A three-week delay in the showdown gave the Democrats the needed opportunity to regroup their forces and beat back the revolt. Some Capitol Hill observers say the critical push to save the Democratic measure came from the powerful Representative Wilbur D. Mills of Arkansas, partly because of his general resistance to revenue sharing and partly because a new G.O.P.-Dixiecrat coalition would undermine possible liberal support for his burgeoning Presidential candidacy.

Worsening Picture

But the prospect of a second Presidential veto after the House and Senate bills are put together chills the hopes for quick creation of 150,000 jobs to cut down the unemployment rolls. The jobless rate has stayed at 6 per cent or higher for the last half-year, despite Administration forecasts that it would start inching down toward the full-employment level of 4 per cent. The picture actually worsened slightly last month, with an especially troublesome spurt in the already high idleness rate among blacks.

When the National Advisory Commission on Civil Disorders concluded, in its landmark report three years ago, that racial imbalances were creating two Americas, separate and unequal, it put much of the blame on unemployment in urban ghettos. The scantiness of the headway made since then to ease black idleness caused the chairman of that commission—former Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois, now a Federal judge—to warn a Senate subcommittee two weeks age that the most explosive factor still prevailing in big-city slums was that nearly one-third of all teen-age Negro job-seekers are currently unable to find work. This is double the high rate among white youth.

An even more discouraging insight into the dimensions of the problem was provided by a special Labor Department study of unemployment in the poverty areas of the 100 biggest cities. It showed a 44.9 per cent unemployment level among black teen-agers, as against an 18.1 per cent rate for white teen-agers in the same districts. In the more affluent sections of the 100 cities, idleness for black teen-agers came to 27.9 per cent compared with 16.6 per cent for whites. Vietnam war veterans also fared badly in the job market, with one out of five of the black returnees unable to find work and one out of seven of the whites.

As one contribution toward keeping the ghettos from boiling over in the hot months ahead, the President announced last week that the Federal Government would provide $303-million this summer to supply work for 674,000 poor teen-agers. Private industry has promised to provide another 150,000 summer jobs without Federal funds. Mr. Nixon said the combined total would be 30 per cent above last year's figure.

But even on the national and adult level, a reversal is occurring in what a few years ago had seemed a clear trend toward narrowing the job gap between whites and blacks. The latest report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics puts over-all unemployment for blacks at 10.5 per cent, for whites at 5.7 per cent. This is too close for anyone's taste to the historic disparity of twice as much joblessness among Negroes as among whites.

There's Hope Now for Welfare

By JIM PARHAM

Welfare reform is needed because the present system is unfair; it discourages family unity and encourages deceitfulness.

It will allow help for a child whose father is dead or deserted, but it denies help to the child next door whose father is unemployed but able-bodied and still in the home.

It will allow cash support for the low earnings of a broken family with young children, but it will not grant cash to assist children in an intact, able-bodied family no matter how little the wages.

IT WILL disregard the first $30 plus one-third of the remainder of the earnings of recipients but denies this advantage to those already working at time of application.

It stops assistance to a child on his 18th birthday even if he's making straight As in school.

It lets an aged couple receive more than a mother with three small children.

It will help a permanently and totally disabled person but not one who is temporarily and partially disabled . . . even if that period of disability will last several months.

It will help a 65 year old who has no income, but if he's only 64 and not disabled, there is no help.

It lets an old man keep $800 if he has it when he applies, but if he gets it after he is on the rolls, it must be counted as income and expended before his checks resume.

It robs the elderly of the promise of a Social Security increase by lowering the supplementary welfare check.

It allows states to establish "standards of need" for life necessities that are totally unrealistic in light of costs of living — and then allows them to pay recipients a small percentage of that already inadequate standard.

It allows a four-person family in Alabama to receive $80 per month while its counterpart in Georgia receives $149 and its counterpart in New Jersey receives $347.

IT IS a system filled with frustration for those who must receive it, those who must administer it and those who must pay for it.

H.R. 1, just passed by the U.S. House of Representatives and passed to the Senate, while not a perfect solution, is a significant step forward.

A perfect solution would not be politically passable.

H.R. 1 includes two major principles that represent important gains in welfare law. The first is the establishment of a national floor under the incomes of families with children. The second is the supplementation of the earnings of the "working poor" intact family.

The national floor of $2,400 for a family of four is not large enough, but it is a base from which to begin. It is about 60 per cent of the current poverty index level of $3,900 per year and a long way from the Bureau of Labor Statistic's "lower level of living" budget of approximately $6,000 for a family of four.

Under the new program the family head can earn $720 per year with no deduction, assuming he or she can work at all. The earnings of students will also be exempt.

HELPING the "working poor" — the working provider of a low income intact family — will assure that it will, with few exceptions, always be "profitable" for a man to work.

Helping the unemployed or underemployed father will remove the incentive for family breakup that has been disastrous in the current program.

The work provisions in the new "Opportunities for Families" segment of the program, if administered fairly and wisely, will offer a chance for many to escape the dependency trap without the risk of being without support if the job is tenuous or doesn't last.

There are provisions for supportive social services and child care that will help eliminate many practical obstacles to successful employment.

A BIG gap which H.R. 1 leaves untouched is the need for help for the 21- to 64-year-old person who is in need but is not aged, blind, disabled, or a dependent child.

The individual may be unemployed or temporarily disabled and not covered by unemployment or workmen's compensation or Social Security disability provisions.

A major problem with the bill as proposed is that it leaves responsibility fragmented among several agencies rather than consolidating administrative accountability.

The aged, blind, and disabled are to receive their money payments from the Social Security Administration but their social services from the state welfare agency.

Families with dependent children will be divided into "employables" and "unemployables" — a sometimes difficult distinction.

"Employables" will be the responsibility of the U.S. Department of Labor including placement, training, social services, and child care. "Unemployables" will receive cash from a new Benefits Assistance Administration within HEW, but social services again will be the responsibility of the state welfare agency.

If a state can organize its resources to effectively move people from dependency to work, we suggest a fiscal bonus to that state for superior performance.

In the past states have only been penalized for not meeting federal standards — never rewarded for going beyond them.

Our suggestion would provide a powerful economic incentive to encourage states to effectively reorganize their "people helping systems," such as family services, youth services, vocational rehabilitation, manpower training, mental health and corrections.

The alternative is continued fragmentation of what should be a unitary approach and perhaps a "leave it all to the feds" attitude.

Since work and training efforts are strongly influenced by state and local considerations, those governments should have a stake in the success of the programs.

Otherwise, we are in for a continued period of "buck passing" the responsibility for effective human services. We will all lose by that . . . and the biggest losers will be the poor people.

Assistance in Georgia

A capsule summary of Georgia welfare beneficiaries and program restrictions has been outlined by the State Department of Family and Children Services.

A total of 600,980 Georgian receive cash and/or food assistance.

Individuals receiving cash assistance as of May 1, 1971 include:

Aged	92,405
Blind	3,216
Disabled	38,123
Children under 18	211,128
Child caretakers	71,729

Individuals receiving nonpublic food supplement assistance total 184,279.

Maximum grant for aged, blind, disabled is $91 per month (equivalent to $32 in 1939 dollar value).

Maximum monthly grant for families with dependent children:

Two persons	$79
Three persons	$114
Four persons	$149
Five or more	$184

A mother with three children can take $34 from her $149 and buy $106 worth of food stamps (if she lives in a food-stamp county). This allows $221 in subsistence resources, $106 for food and $115 for all else.

Three Times the Money

By FRANK J. GROSCHELLE

The welfare reform bill was passed last year by the House on a vote of 243 to 155; on Tuesday the bill was passed by a vote of 288 to 132, a gain of 45 congressional votes for the bill.

I think it is extremely important that the over-all effect of this bill be carefully considered as it goes before the Senate. When President Nixon submitted his welfare reform proposal to Congress—more than a year ago—it contained five basic principles:

—Federal minimum level of payment,

—Uniform eligibility requirements,

—Strong work incentives and work requirements,

—Wage supplementation for the working poor and —Fiscal protection for the states.

TO ELABORATE, look at a state which may now be paying as little as $800 per year in assistance to a family of four, which I think everyone will agree is not sufficient for even the basic bare necessities of life.

Under the welfare reform bill, that family of four would receive a minimum assistance payment of $2,400 per year, all of which would be federal funds.

This is where the fiscal protection of the states provision applies.

In addition, the head of the family would be able to earn an additional $60 per month, or $720 per year, without being penalized on assistance payments.

Above that, this family of four would be able to keep $1 out of each $3 earned until such time as the assistance payments would be wiped out completely.

REGIONALLY, the amount of new money will be in excess of $625 million and results in a new saving of $370 million to the eight states in Region IV of HEW.

If the pending bill currenly pending in the Senate is enacted, Georgia stands stands to receive an additional $62.8 million in new funds.

This money would represent an increase in payments to needy families in the state. In addition, it would result in a net savings of $51.8 million that could be used to meet other pressing needs within the State of Georgia.

Welfare rolls nationally have been increasing at an alarming rate.

During the eight-month period ending in March 1971, the national increase in number of recipients was 32 per cent, while the increase in cost was 36 per cent.

The Georgia rolls exceeded this rate with a growth in number of recipients of 52.2 per cent while cost increased by 62.5 per cent.

The uniform eligibility provision is just that. For the first time, people in all states would be governed by the same set of rules on eligibility. The states would be guaranteed that their future welfare costs will be less than expenditures under the current program.

THE UNIFORM eligibility provision is just that. For the first time, people in all states would be governed by the same set of rules on eligibility.

Our present 54 programs nationally and 54 sets of rules will be replaced by one program and one set of rules.

The meausre also calls for federal administration of money payments while the states would continue to provide social services to those in need.

The states would be assured fiscal protection through a "hold harmless" provision which guarantees that their future welfare costs will be less than expenditures under the current program.

A basic element of the administration's welfare reform proposal is its emphasis on work. With limited exceptions, every able-bodied adult applicant, including those who are employed, would be required to register with the employment office.

They must then accept training, upgrading, employment or manpower services to be eligible for benefits.

SUPPOSE, then, that the head of a family refuses to accept a job or to accept training for a job. Minimum level of payment is based on $800 annually each for the first two members of the family and $400 each for the second two members of the family.

We certainly are not going to cut off food to dependent children because the parent refuses work but assistance to that family would be reduced immediately by $800 per year or one-third of its assistance payments.

THE WELFARE reform plan is not being put forth as a panacea to all problems. It cannot make any guarantees, but . . . given the chance . . . we feel it can help remove some of the barriers to opportunity that the present system has institutionalized.

Today, we stand at a crossroad. We can continue to talk about welfare, complain about it and watch it grow unchecked while we raise taxes this year and every year thereafter to feed its cancerous growth.

Or, we can take the steps necessary to control it and to reform it so that it will at least have the proud purpose of maximizing human dignity and salvaging the destitute.

I submit that we are at that crossroad and the decision as to which road to take is very logical and apparent.

Flaws in Welfare Reform Bill

WASHINGTON—Why in the world would the National Welfare Rights Organization oppose a welfare measure which finally established the principle that no family will be allowed to sink below a certain level of degradation?

Are poor people abandoning this floor of $2,400 a year for a family of four out of some naive notion that Congress will soon approve a floor of $6,500, the amount government studies say is the minimum needed for a decent urban life?

No. If it were just the money level, poor people would accept the measure that Rep. Wilbur Mills has pushed to the floor of the House, according to George A. Wiley, NWRO's executive director.

But Wiley cites several little-publicized aspects of the bill that are insulting, demeaning, or simply threaten to make hundreds of thousands of poor people worse off than they are under the current crazy jumble of welfare laws.

Wiley points out that the $2,400 Federal benefit level is less than current benefits plus food stamps now being received by welfare families in 45 states and the District of Columbia.

Unless NWRO and others can convince state legislatures to approve programs to supplement the family assistance plan, which is highly unlikely, 90 per cent of the welfare families in the country will be worse off after welfare reform.

"We fear that this so-called $2,400 floor will actually become a ceiling," Wiley says.

The reform measure would deny benefits to any family the head of which is a regular student at a college or university—presumably a Congressional slap at "student troublemakers." Wiley points out that many welfare mothers attend college under the Work Incentive Program (WIN) and that this new restriction would discourage heads of welfare families from attempting to lift themselves.

NWRO people are deeply concerned that eligibility for family assistance payments would no longer be based on current need, but on a complicated formula involving what income the family had over the last quarter, or three-quarters.

Under the new law, if a family had $4,320 income over nine months and the breadwinner lost his job, that family could not get welfare help for three months no matter how genuine its need. The law makes the absurd presumption that the family would save enough of the $4,320 to hedge against a period of unemployment.

Wiley points out that this works heavily against migrant workers, seasonal workers, and poor minority people who suffer frequent periods of joblessness.

This new restriction also will affect greatly poor workers who seek to organize unions. Without fat strike funds, they have relied on welfare in the event of a strike or lockout. Under the new bill, with welfare unavailable, unionizing activities would become less plausible.

Wiley says the proposed new law has built in "an administrative horrow show" in which poor people face harassment and a gross loss of rights.

He points out that recipients would be cut off automatically at the end of two years. In addition, families must file quarterly reports on income, with fines, a welfare cutoff, or other penalties for those who forget.

"These restrictions don't apply to the aged, disabled, and blind where 80 per cent of the recipients are white," Wiley notes. "They apply only to families, which means they are selectively aimed at minorities."

NWRO is especially irritated that the new bill mandates forced work for mothers of children over the age of six, and after 1974 for mothers of children over three. Lack of acceptable child care is not recognized as a gound for refusal of employment or training.

Sections of Welfare Reform Bill Attacked by Coalition Group

✦ THE CAMPAIGN for Adequate Welfare Reform Now, a group of 16 religious and nine secular agencies, has registered its opposition to a section of the House welfare reform bill, known as "HR 1." The organization cited five "major reasons" for opposing the bill's Title IV, the Family Assistance Plan: (1) "The $2,400 benefit level for a family of four is too low. There is no provision requiring the states to supplement the $2,400 figure. There will be no more food stamps"; (2) "The differences between the largely white adult categories and the mostly black family categories of HR 1 suggest that this is a racist bill"; (3) "Mothers of school age children would be forced to work at low wages. Day care provisions are inadequate"; (4) "The civil rights of recipients are not guaranteed"; (5) "There is insufficient fiscal relief to states." Some of the campaign's member agencies are: the National Council of Churches, the United Methodist Church's Board of Christian Social Concerns, the Friends Committee on National Legislation, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the United Presbyterian Church, the National Office of Black Catholics, the Board of Social Ministries of the Lutheran Church in America, the National Association of Social Workers and the National Council of Negro Women. According to a spokesman, the central purpose of the campaign is the "achievement this year of major welfare reform to create a new system of income maintenance assistance to meet the basic needs of all individuals and families" who are in need because of inadequate income, inability to work or unavailability of jobs.

WALL STREET JOURNAL, TUESDAY, JULY 27, 1971

A Welfare Bill That Makes Sense

By ROBERT L. BARTLEY

WASHINGTON – Last year's welfare reform bill was an exercise in camouflage – how to have welfare reform without really changing anything. This year's welfare reform bill is an exercise in administration – how to align responsibility with authority in setting benefits, determining eligibility and running work programs.

The change took place while no one was looking. The House Ways and Means Committee rewrote the bill in private sessions, and the House passed the measure because Ways and Means Chairman Wilbur Mills told it to. The extent of the change should become clearer shortly, though, as the Senate Finance Committee opens public hearings today. The Finance Committee killed last year's bill but may prove more agreeable this year.

The two bills are similar, of course, in being built on President Nixon's Family Assistance Plan, paying a minimum income to all families with children. The amount of the federal payment for a family of four remains about the same, $2,400 in cash this year versus $1,600 plus food stamps last year.

The principal effects of last year's bill remain: increased benefits in the South, wider payments to the working poor, more money for work training and day care. This expansion of welfare was, for all the tough rhetoric, the whole thrust of last year's bill. In the large industrial states, where the welfare crisis is, the bill would have left the welfare system essentially unchanged.

The Increasing Caseload

This year that thrust has been balanced by reforms that do take some notice of the real welfare crisis. As outlined in an article on this page last Thursday, the crisis is measured in the increasing welfare caseload. Aid-to-families cases have doubled in the last four years to 10 million persons, or one in twenty Americans, a rate of growth that suggests the creation of a vast unrooted class, dependent on welfare and cut off from the social bonds of the work system.

This growth may be the result of social values toward low-status jobs, and these won't easily be altered. But it has also been closely associated with unprofessional welfare administration and with grant levels so high they compete with wages. The changes written into the welfare bill by Rep. Mills' committee are designed to have a definite impact in both these areas.

The changes, in fact, show a heavy preoccupation with the question of administration. The committee is definitely interested in curbing the break-neck expansion in the welfare rolls, and tried to do so as long ago as 1967 by writing work incentive and work training provisions into the law. Most of its members believe their intent was subverted by administrators bent instead on expanding the rolls. They are now trying to reduce the discretion of administrators, and to replace them wherever possible.

In particular, the committee is upset at the result of a provision in the 1967 law allowing states to decide which recipients are "appropriate" for work or training. This year's bill intends to do nothing less than eliminate state administration of welfare. The federal payments will be administered by a new set of officials under the federal civil service. And only by turning over any state supplemental as the income level rises toward average. This means that each step up in welfare benefits makes them competitive with wages for many more workers than the last similar step did. This effect helps explain why caseloads have mounted far more sharply than anyone anticipated.

The unanticipated caseload rise has meant heavy financial pressures on states even for their share of the costs, and in the past year several of them have in fact reduced benefits. In theory the Ways and Means bill could encourage this trend. Under its provisions, the federal government will pay 100% of the $2,400 guarantee and the states must pay 100% of any supplement above this. Thus instead of splitting the savings from benefit reduction under the current sharing formula, the state would recoup all the saving from any cut in its supplements.

This theoretical "incentive" toward reduced payments still worries some liberals, but in fact it was fairly well nullified when the committee adopted the "hold harmless" provision. Under "hold harmless" the federal government will guarantee that a state will not have to spend more for welfare than it did in 1971, even if its caseload continues to increase.

The states with the highest benefits and sharpest caseload increases will find their welfare costs dependent not on benefit levels but on the "hold harmless" payment, and thus will have no incentive to cut benefits. The question will not arise in states now paying less than $2,400. Some intermediate states will be able to save money if they want to cut payments, but for the most part the effect of the new bill would be to freeze benefit levels.

Between the abolition of the present sharing formula and the administrative changes, the Ways and Means Committee has considerably changed the thrust of welfare reform. This has been little noticed by opponents of last year's bill, though, and some fairly meaningless things are being said about welfare reform by those who pass as conservatives on the American scene. Anyone upset because the President has proposed a guaranteed annual income, for example, ought to ask himself what the current system already is.

It's only slightly more sensible to stress the complaint that the bill expands the welfare rolls by some 14 million by including the working poor. At the rate we are going, many of these people will be added anyway. Beyond that, in terms of social consequences there is an enormous difference between supporting a non-working class with few social bonds and paying supplements to those who stick with the work system. Rep. Mills makes a point worth considering when he says, "The reason we included the working poor is to eliminate the temptation for them to become completely dependent."

That is scarcely to say there are no valid questions about the bill from the perspective of those interested in reducing welfare dependency. The surest way to slow caseload growth probably would be to reduce benefits, and a conservative can make an intelligent case that it's better to stick with the present system now that the states are starting to cut back.

Especially so since the "hold harmless" provision would concentrate an incentive to reduce not in states paying welfare benefits above the official poverty level, but in intermediate states where benefits may not effectively compete with wages. The federal government, also, is far from immune to pressure for higher benefits. There will be attempts to raise the $2,400 floor in the Senate, and it probably would not take much of an increase to send rolls upward by making benefits competitive with wages throughout the South.

Still, the current state reductions may not reflect a long-term trend, given the incentives in the current sharing formula. Also, it's one thing to say benefits should not have been raised to present levels, but another thing to be enthusiastic about a state's cutting them after it has encouraged recipients to rely on them. In principle, finally, it would be far better to support the truly needy at a more generous level, and rely on an administrative mechanism to separate them from those who ought to be self-dependent.

A Key Question

Is it possible to create any such an administration? That's the key question the Ways and Means bill poses. History would not give much comfort, suggesting the most likely outcome is that the committee will once again find its intentions undermined by bureaucrats with different ideas. If the caseload increase does result from underlying cultural values, the same values will be present in the new bureaucracy as in the old one.

Still, a 1969 study of welfare use did find that administration matters. Several students of the problem believe that hard-headed administration is the only way to cope with the fact that a level high enough to support the needy will also be high enough to compete with wages. Blanche Bernstein of the Center for New York City Affairs, for example, writes of the need for a new "administrative ambience" and "public rhetoric."

Harvard's Edward C. Banfield agrees. "I am told that welfare bureaucracies willing to perform the function I have in mind simply do not exist anymore; most social workers, it is said, believe that their mission is to give as much as possible to as many as possible. Perhaps this is so, but I am not entirely convinced. I suspect that in general and within limits social workers do what is expected of them and that local welfare administrators have ways of checking indiscriminate generosity," he writes in The Public Interest. "Therefore I do not entirely despair of improving matters by using welfare bureaucracies to help strike a balance between the supply of assistance and the demand for it."

In effect, Rep. Mills and his committee are trying to do what such scholars recommend. Whatever the defects of their bill, it is based in a defensible rationale about what constitutes the welfare crisis and how it might be cured. It may not be a bill that actually succeeds in curbing the welfare explosion, but at least it's a bill that makes some sense.

This growth may be the result of social values toward low-status jobs, and these won't easily be altered. But it has also been closely associated with unprofessional welfare administration and with grant levels so high they compete with wages. The changes written into the welfare bill by Rep. Mills' committee are designed to have a definite impact in both these areas.

The changes, in fact, show a heavy preoccupation with the question of administration. The committee is definitely interested in curbing the break-neck expansion in the welfare rolls, and tried to do so as long ago as 1967 by writing work incentive and work training provisions into the law. Most of its members believe their intent was subverted by administrators bent instead on expanding the rolls. They are now trying to reduce the discretion of administrators, and to replace them wherever possible.

In particular, the committee is upset at the result of a provision in the 1967 law allowing states to decide which recipients are "appropriate" for work or training. This year's bill intends to do nothing less than eliminate state administration of welfare. The federal payments will be administered by a new set of officials under the federal civil service. And only by turning over any state supplemental payments to federal administration will states qualify for the "hold harmless" provision protecting them against future increases in welfare expenditures.

Similarly, many members of the committee are also unhappy with the federal Department of Health, Education and Welfare, which has bent administrative pressure not toward putting recipients to work but toward higher benefits and reduced regulation. Accordingly, under this year's proposal, welfare families will be split in two groups, and all those with a potentially employable adult will come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor.

Nor would administrators have discretion about what recipients are "appropriate" or what jobs "suitable." The criteria for such decisions are explicit in the law. All recipients would be referred for work or training except the ill, aged, children under 16 (or under 22 for students), mothers of children under age six until 1974 and under age three subsequently. (Mothers of older children would not be required to work, however, unless adequate child care is available.) Jobs are suitable unless they involve union disputes or pay less than $1.20 an hour or the locally prevailing wage for the work in question.

Most important of all, there's at least a hope this new administrative structure will be infused with new attitudes, focusing not on adding more people to the welfare rolls but on getting them off the rolls and into a self-dependent life. HEW officials proposed, and the committee instantly rejected, bringing present state welfare workers into the new federal structure. It hopes the federal civil service will be able to recruit a higher grade of employe, and also one who defines his job a different way.

A 'Different Psychology'

"The social work will still be left to the states; this will be determining eligibility and making payments," Rep. Mills says. When it comes to work training, he adds, the Labor Department will have a "different psychology." And in any event, if rolls do continue to rise, "We've got people in the federal government we can hold responsible for the failures; that's always been difficult."

A similar clarification of responsibility is the keynote of the proposed changes affecting benefit levels. The bill would end the system under which state legislatures have been able to vote higher benefits and have the federal government pay much of the bill.

This effect has been especially pronounced because of a "sleeper" provision in the "Medicaid" law, allowing states to apply the sharing formula in that legislation to their welfare expenditures as well. Under the old welfare formula the federal government paid 50% to 65% of the cost, but federal expenses were limited to $32 per recipient per month. The Medicaid formula put the federal contribution as high as 83%, and pledged the government to contribute its share regardless of how high a state raised its benefits.

These changes allowed the states to increase benefits rapidly. Between January 1967 and October 1970, for example, "need levels" on which benefits are based were increased more than 40% in 17 states. This almost certainly played an important part in the exploding caseload, for there is considerable evidence that higher benefit levels mean higher caseloads, particularly when they get high enough to compete with wages for low-income workers.

It's important to understand, in fact, that the income distribution at low levels is an inverted pyramid, including ever more people tives on the American scene. Anyone upset because the President has proposed a guaranteed annual income, for example, ought to ask himself what the current system already is.

It's only slightly more sensible to stress the complaint that the bill expands the welfare rolls by some 14 million by including the working poor. At the rate we are going, many of these people will be added anyway. Beyond that, in terms of social consequences there is an enormous difference between supporting a non-working class with few social bonds and paying supplements to those who stick with the work system. Ending Poverty

A federal review committee is considering eliminating poverty from official reports by banning the word itself. The Census Bureau has already decided to say "low-income" instead of "poverty" in its official releases. Government statisticians began thinking along these lines after the press discovered an embarrassing census report last May showing that the number of people below the poverty level, if you'll pardon the expression, is on the rise for the first time in ten years. The statistical change was due only partly to an administrative change in definition. The welfare rolls have increased by more than two and one-quarter million people since January of 1970 – a burden under which state budgets are cracking. Many states, including New York, California, New Jersey and Maine have lowered or are about to lower welfare budgets for the next fiscal year.

Because the states and the cities are complaining so loudly, President Nixon is anxious to have Congress ratify the new welfare bill, which has been passed by the House and is now called HR 1. Last year a similar administration proposal went as far as the Senate Finance Committee, where liberal and conservative members voted to defeat it 10-6. HR 1, drawn up largely by Ways and Means Committee Chairman Wilbur Mills (D, Ark.), is carefully designed to satisfy demands for stricter screening of applicants, while establishing the principle of a guaranteed minimum income. Yet, the bill may die once again in the Finance Committee because the most liberal and the most conservative senators are unhappy with it.

As it stands, HR 1 contains several major improvements over the old system. In simplified terms, it sets a federally guaranteed minimum income of $2400 for a family of four. The major burden of welfare costs is transferred to the federal government, leaving states free to supplement federal payments if they choose. Federal assistance is given to the working poor as well as the unemployable (up to an income level of $4140), thus eliminating the invidious distinction between welfare families and working families. Finally, the bill provides jobs and job training for employable adults who need work but cannot find it, and establishes money incentives for fathers to stay with their families and seek work.

But HR 1 also has a number of loopholes and punitive features which make it unacceptable to Senators Abraham Ribicoff (D, Conn.) and Edward Kennedy (D, Mass.) and groups like the Welfare Rights Organization. They point out, for example, that nothing in the bill would prevent states from lowering or completely eliminating their present welfare programs once the federal system goes into effect. If every state were to abdicate to the federal government and refuse to supplement the basic rate, families in 45 states and the District of Columbia would receive less than they do today. In addition, under the Family Assistance Plan, HR 1 allows a maximum of $3600 to any family, regardless of its size, whereas under the present system, assistance is proportionate to the number of children. Moreover, FAP is not consistent with other portions of HR 1; it grants $2400 to a family of four, while old-age benefits under another section come to the same amount for one couple.

Critics of the bill also note that it denies welfare payments to a family headed by a full-time college student, which means that welfare mothers attending college would have to drop out or give up welfare. It likewise denies welfare to a family whose income during the nine months before applying is higher than the poverty cut-off line. There is no relief for the improvident or the accident-prone. Penalties are imposed on mothers of small children, if the mothers do not seek work. Until 1974, mothers of children up to six years old would not have to get an outside-the-house job, but after that, only mothers of children under three would be exempt. A mother who did not want to put her children in a day care center would have to give up welfare. Employable welfare recipients would be required to accept jobs at 75 percent of the minimum wage ($1.20 an hour) if they could find nothing better. Those who refuse would lose benefits, and their childrens' payments would be turned over to a third-party administrator.

The punitive, coercive character of HR 1 is more offensive to many than its simple economic inconsistencies. The notion that people go on welfare because they're lazy is a myth which some congressmen and many more ordinary citizens accept without evidence. The Ways and Means Committee Report covering the Family Assistance sections of HR 1 says: "Your committee is convinced, both on the basis of specific studies and on the testimony of witnesses before the committee, that there are many thousands of people now on the AFDC rolls who do not belong there." It also expresses shock that the number of welfare recipients increased by "2¼ million people in one year!"

Common sense tells us that when a recession produces unemployment, people without jobs will ask for welfare. No one who follows the news should be shocked to learn that a 5.6 percent rate of unemployment coincides with a rush on the welfare offices. Forcing those who can't find regular jobs to work for less than the minimum wage leaves a bad taste when we know that the administration has deliberately induced an economic slow-down as part of its anti-inflation crusade.

On July 12, the President signed an Emergency Employment Act to provide 200,000 new public service jobs for the unemployed. These jobs are not specifically marked for poverty cases and they will directly benefit only one-twenty-fifth of the more than million unemployed in the country. If the government can muster nothing better than this, how does it expect welfare parents to respond favorably to the restrictions against goldbricking that are written into HR 1?

Senator Ribicoff, former Secretary of HEW and a member of the Senate Finance Committee, has sponsored with Senator Kennedy a list of amendments to refashion HR 1 into a more consistent, humane welfare bill. The most important of the 15 amendments ask for an increase in basic welfare rates for a family of four from $2400 to $2800; mandatory state supplements to the federal rate – stabilizing welfare payments at the 1971 level; aid to states with heavy welfare burdens; adjustment of all payments according to the cost-of-living index; and elimination of residency requirements and discouraging application processes.

There is little hope on Capitol Hill that all of these amendments will be approved. Indeed there is little hope that the Senate Finance Committee will report out any form of HR 1 that will meet the major criticisms made of it. Most of the members are skeptical of welfare programs anyway. Last year Chairman Russell Long (D, La.) called the Nixon Family Assistance Plan "Moynihan's monstrosity," something which could "utterly and completely destroy this country." Although he seems to like HR 1 more than the old bill, he now says that he will not approve it. He believes it would create a "permanent welfare subculture," and he expects the majority of the Finance Committee to go along with him in asking for a "workfare program" of guaranteed employment, not income.

HR 1 poses a dilemma for congressmen who don't like it as it stands but fear that no better proposal can survive passage through the labyrinth of conservative committees. Wilbur Mills may refuse to cooperate on a new proposal if his own bill is rejected. Welfare reform is a complicated, expensive, wearying task, and few congressmen or government officials will be eager to begin again from scratch if the 92nd Congress fails, as the 91st did, to come up with legislation. Those who believe that HR 1 is inadequate, and it is, should remember that state governments have already started to cut back welfare rates and will do so as the number of recipients increases. Former Secretary of HEW Wilbur Cohen believes that unless some form of HR 1 is passed, we may have to wait as long as five years for a new welfare system. He is willing to compromise for now on financial specifics if that will persuade congressmen to vote for the bill.

Despite its faults, HR 1 would move the federal government closer to a sensible welfare policy. Congress should make every effort to assure that welfare payments will not fall below their present level, and to eliminate the bill's harassing features. But the principle of a federally guaranteed minimum income makes it worth adopting. HR 1 provides a solid base on which future Congresses can build.

WELFARE ROLLS CUT BY ALABAMA

New Policy Removes Many Who Show Any Income From Other Source

By BILL KOVACH

© New York Times News Service

MONTGOMERY, Ala. — More than 33,000 people, most of them Negroes, have been cut off the welfare rolls in Alabama in the last four months in a cutback that parallels a growing national trend to reduce aid to the poor.

Although welfare officials here refused to estimate the savings from the reduction, a rough calculation based on average payments in the programs affected indicates the state has cut its welfare budget by some $5 million a year.

Since the law here also ties Medicaid payments to public assistance, there is a double saving because none of those removed from public assistance rolls now qualifies for medical benefits under that program. The total amount saved will not be known for some time.

Trend Is National

Alabama's welfare cutbacks are only the most marked example of a national trend that has resulted in the first national decline in welfare cases in three years. The U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare has announced that figures for May show caseload decreases in at least 19 states and Puerto Rico — the most prominent being found here and in Puerto Rico.

Even in the traditionally liberal states of New York and California, stringent measures have been taken to reduce welfare budgets, and these programs are bearing the brunt of the effects of inflation, rising government costs and taxpayer revolt.

Reuben K. King, Alabama's commissioner of pensions and security, defends the cutback here as an "effort to hurt only those best able to stand it."

The change, like any adjustment of a welfare program, is a complex one. But stripped of a web of technical complications, it reduced the number of people on welfare who had some other form of income.

More than 33,000 people with some outside income were removed from the rolls. Payments were reduced for 17,500 others.

"It was," says King, "the only equitable way to make an adjustment. Those people most in need — with no outside income — were unaffected. In this business you have to be a realist, not an idealist. We were faced with a budget deficit, which, under the law, we cannot do. We had to make a change and, after a lot of soul searching, this we thought most equitable."

Although welfare officials argue that their method of reducing welfare costs hurt those who can most stand it, King concedes that the major damage has come from their removal from the Medicaid rolls.

"This," he says, "is what is so tragic about the change."

State Welfare Cut Under Attacks In Federal Court

Ala. Journal 9/15/71

By JUDITH HELMS

A cut in state welfare payments this year is under attack in federal court by plaintiffs claiming their constitutional rights have been violated.

Three judges heard a lengthy cross examination by plaintiffs of Harris Hill Cory Jr. of the Department of Pensions and Security's Bureau of Accounts on why payments were cut when a surplus of some $3 million seems probable.

Plaintiffs, who filed suit in April as a class action, are three women who receive state aid.

They claimed a May 1 announcement by department head Reuben King that methods of determining eligibility for Aid to Dependent Children (ADC) and Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled (APTD) were being altered violated their rights.

U.S. Dist. Judge Frank Johnson Jr. denied a motion for temporary restraining order that accompanied the suit, saying the court was impressed that defendants promulgated the regulation "in good faith and by reason of the limitation of available funds."

He also noted that the regulation had been approved by the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfard (HEW).

Johnson is hearing the case on the merits today along with U.S. Circuit Judge John Godbold and Dist. Judge Robert Varner.

Cory was this morning's only witness, called after introduction of voluminous documentary evidence.

He said he hoped to have some $3 million on hand at the end of the current fiscal year but said the department always carries a balance forward to continue operations "to maintain a steady program without fluctuations."

Cory said, however, the sum is an unusually large one to carry but he explained that the case load was not as great as had been anticipated.

He said the cut was necessary to come within estimated available funds.

Welfare Rolls Slashed 33,000

Welfare - Ala.

More than 33,000 people, most of them Negroes, have been cut off the welfare rolls in Alabama in the last four months.

Although welfare officials here refused to estimate the savings from the reduction, a rough calculation based on average payments in the programs affected indicates the state has cut its welfare budget by some $5 million a year.

Since the law here also ties medicaid payments to public assistance, there is a double saving because none of those removed from public assistance rolls now qualifies for medical benefits under that program.

The total amount saved will not be known for some time. Some critics suspect that Gov. George C. Wallace will use the savings to increase payments next year to the state's 115,000 old-age assistance recipients, who are predominantly white and a potent group in state politics.

Reuben K. King, Alabama's Commissioner of Pensions and Security, defends the cutback here as an "effort to hurt only those best able to stand it."

The change, like any adjustment of a welfare program, is a complex one. But stripped of a web of technical complications, it reduced the number of people on welfare who had some other form of income.

An example of those made ineligible was a mother with three minor children who had been receiving aid-to-dependent children payments. The state calculated her needs to be $230 a month, leaving an unmet need of $100 a month.

Alabama paid its recipients 35 per cent of the unmet need (one of the lowest and far below the 100 per cent of need paid old-age recipients or, in this case, $35, giving her a total income of $165.

Under the new program, the 35 per cent of need calculation is applied to the need — in this case, 35 per cent of $230, or $80.50. Since her outside income ($130 a month) exceeds this figure, the woman no longer qualifies for any welfare payment and her total income has been reduced from $206.50 a month to $130.

In this way more than 33,000 people with some outside income were removed from the rolls. Payments were reduced for 17,500 others.

"It was," says King, "the only equitable way to make an adjustment. Those people most in need — with no outside income — were unaffected. In this business you have to be a realist, not an idealist. We were faced with a budget deficit, which, under the law, we cannot do. We had to make a change and, after a lot of soul searching, this we thought most equitable."

Although welfare officials argue that their method of reducing welfare costs hurt those who can most stand it, King concedes that the major damage has come from their removal from the medicaid rolls.

"This," he says, "is what is so tragic about the change."

1971 Federal Welfare Reform Proposals

(These proposals were introduced in the House of Representatives earlier this year and will be up for consideration shortly by the Senate Finance Committee)

	Major Provisions of:	PRESENT WELFARE PROGRAMS	FAMILY ASSISTANCE PLAN, HR 1 with revisions — supported by the Nixon Administration	HR 7388 supported by "CAMPAIGN FOR ADEQUATE WELFARE REFORM"	ADEQUATE INCOME ACT OF 1971 (National Welfare Rights Organization Bill, HR 7257)
1.	Annual grant for a family of four.	Varies $636 to $4,164 National Median: $2,650	$2400 (States may supplement but with no Federal matching funds)	$3,600 in 1972	$6,500
2.	Annual grant for an aged individual	Varies $585 to $1,475 National average: $900	$1800	$1,600 in 1972	$2,250
3.	Provision toward "adequacy" beyond 1972	None. Reduction possible in some states.	None. Reduction probable in many states.	4 annual steps to Lower Living Standard consumption level, according to Bureau of Labor Statistics.	Benefits maintained at approximately the Lower Living Standard consumption level according to BLS.
4.	Eligibility	Excludes non-disabled adults 18-65 who do not have dependent children, working poor, & in many states, families having two parents present.	Excludes non-disabled adults 18-65 who do not have dependent children.	Includes all persons in need.	Includes all persons in need.
5.	Rights & Protections	Rights of recipient often vague, often violated by states without redress except occasional court action on behalf of recipients.	Similar to existing program. May be more punitive.	Rights & due process requirements explicit.	Rights & due process requirements explicit.
6.	Employment requirements	Able-bodied adults, including Mothers with youngest child over 12 years.	Able-bodied adults, including Mother with youngest child over 6.	Able-bodied adults except Mothers caring for dependent children.	No work requirement, but positive work incentive.
7.	Wage standards for acceptable jobs.	Not in violation of any law.	Similar to existing program.	Wage must be at least Federal minimum wage rate or prevailing wage in community, whichever is higher.	Covered by other legislation.
8.	Work incentive: % of income that can be kept by recipients	Varies. Minimum: no incentive. Maximum: $30 per month and 1/3 of the remainder. Applies only earned income.	$60 per month plus 1/3 remainder. Applies only to earned income.	40% of all income.	33 1/3% of all income.
9.	Program Administration	Varies: State or state-local	Uncertain: May be Federal or a mixture of Federal and State-local.	Federal.	Federal.
10.	Estimated additional cost for 1972 over present program.	See note.	$5 - 8 Billion	$8 Billion	$50 Billion full employment economy with increasing job opportunities for all who seek work can deal effectively with the needs of America's working people and their families.

It can be achieved only if the federal government adopts and pursues expansionary fiscal and monetary policies with selective job-creating programs and manpower training programs to assure full employment—jobs at decent wages for all people who are able to work and want jobs.

The need for a large-scale public service employment program is particularly urgent in light of the continuing failure of the private sector of the U.S. economy to open up enough jobs to reach and maintain full employment. Public service jobs and public service facilities are needed not simply to provide jobs, although that in itself is important, but also to serve the people and to enhance the quality of American life.

Full employment policies will need to be supplemented, however, by a federalized U.S. Employment Service, by an effective federal unemployment insurance program for those people who can't find jobs in the private or public sector and by an effective welfare system for those people who are unable to work. Extended and improved unemployment insurance benefits are needed for long-term unemployed workers, including those displaced by automation and technological change. These workers must have available more adequate training and retraining opportunities to help them acquire the skills required by new technology. Furthermore, public and private action to assure equal opportunity in employment is needed.

Also, more information is needed on the process of automation and technological change. Federal action is needed to set up a technological clearing house to gather information on a continuing basis on technological change and its effects on the welfare of the American people, on jobs, skills, training needs and industry location. With more and better information, public and private adjustment programs can better avoid needless human hardship and suffering which too often result from the disruptive impact of spreading automation.

Through this clearing house, the federal government could provide unions and employers with comprehensive information and service, upon request, to help develop labor-management solutions for the complex problems related to the impact of automation and technological change at the workplace.

Collective bargaining has a key role in meeting the human challenges of automation and technological progress at the workplace—and this role must be expanded and strengthened. At the same time, national full employment programs must assure an economic climate in which collective bargaining can flourish. And these national programs must help solve the social and human adjustment problems created by automation and new technology which lie outside the scope of collective bargaining.

Welfare Reform

Welfare Reform and the Work Ethic

by Bert Seidman

The prevailing American mores about welfare have been expressed many times in recent years and by many people—in high and low status alike—but perhaps President Nixon summed it up most succinctly in his 1972 Labor Day message:

"We are faced this year with the choice between the 'work ethic' that built this nation's character—and the new 'welfare ethic' that could cause that American character to weaken."

Now when the President, or anyone else, says "welfare," what he means is AFDC—Aid to Families with Dependent Children—a program we have had since the enactment of the Social Security Act of 1935. AFDC is in fact a title in the Social Security Act. Of course, we have other categories of welfare, too—Old Age Assistance, Aid to the Permanently and Totally Disabled and Aid to the Blind. Like AFDC, all of these so-called "adult category" programs are federally-subsidized with considerably higher payment levels than AFDC. In the last Congress, they were brought together into a single federal program called Supplemental Security Income. But despite the desire of many people in these categories to obtain employment, nobody talks about the "work ethic" in connection with them. When you talk about "the work ethic" in relation to welfare, it means simply: "Why aren't those lazy bums on AFDC forced to work?"

Although unemployed fathers are now eligible for AFDC under very stringent conditions, only a minute percentage of those on the AFDC rolls are able-bodied men. The overwhelming majority—indeed 99 percent or more—are mothers and children in poverty. What is most striking about all the discussion about welfare reform, "workfare" and the work ethic is that this fundamental fact is virtually ignored.

BERT SEIDMAN is director of the AFL-CIO Department of Social Security. This article is based on his presentation to the Industrial Relations Research Association's recent winter meeting in Toronto.

The prime purpose of AFDC as it was originally conceived was exactly what its name specifies: to provide assistance to dependent children. Our whole approach to welfare reform therefore ought to be: What is best for these millions of disadvantaged and underprivileged children? Those are fancy words to describe kids who are hungry and ill-clothed and living in rat-infested tenements surrounded by filth, despair, degradation and often disease. Instead, their plight is ignored and all the attention is placed on the alleged sins of the adult, frequently referred to as "he" as if these were predominantly two-parent families where both father and mother are refusing to take the good jobs that are offered to them. But whatever may or may not be the sins of their parents, the guiltless children share heavily in the punishment.

Even well-intentioned welfare reformers most often forget about these children. I was absolutely amazed that in his Wall Street speech on welfare reform during the 1972 presidential election campaign, Sen. George McGovern referred to the children dependent on welfare exactly once. The rest of his welfare reform ideas all centered on the adults.

It is rare that anyone remembers the original purpose of AFDC but Sen. John O. Pastore (D-R.I.) did, if only briefly, in the 1972 Senate debate on welfare reform-social security legislation. Even Pastore seemed to give first priority to costs rather than the children's welfare, but this is what he said:

"Is it not going to be cheaper and better to keep that home intact by keeping the mother home with the children, rather than putting the children in a day care center, which is going to be much more expensive, and have the mother go to work? That was the whole principle of aid to dependent children."

If welfare reform were to focus first and foremost on the needs of the children, it would not begin with the work problem. Yet both conservative and liberal critics of the existing system have mainly concentrated on the relationship of welfare to work. They have paid scanty, if any, attention to whether their solutions benefit the hordes of children mired, through no fault of their own, in the welfare trap.

Everyone knows that conservatives have the all-consuming objective of getting the needy off welfare into work. Sen. Russell Long (D-La.), chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, coined the catchy word "workfare" for this approach and it seems to have been picked up widely. It rests on the assumption that most welfare recipients over the age of 16 are employable but are unwilling to work and therefore should be forced into jobs. If they refuse, welfare payments for them and their families should be cut off.

There seems to be some confusion as to whether the jobs already exist or would have to be created. The nature of these jobs is very unclear; Long talks about workfare enrollees picking up dead dogs on the highways. Clearly he and others mean to force lots of welfare mothers who are the sole parent in their families into cleaning the houses of more fortunate, two-parent families. Long's plan would have both subsidies to private employers and new unspecified jobs in public employment. But no labor standards or guarantees of suitable employment would be provided as they are in unemployment insurance. Wages in most cases would be far below the statutory minimum. This is by no means an untried approach—but, whenever it has been tried, it has failed.

What is not often noted is that the liberals (and some conservatives like Milton Friedman) who have proposed the negative income tax as the welfare reform panacea are also mesmerized by the relationship between welfare and work.

The negative income tax provides every family (including in some versions childless couples and single individuals) a base amount, usually geared to family size, which is then reduced by a certain percentage of every dollar of other income received.

For example, suppose a negative income tax program provides a base amount of $4,000 for a 4-person family (approximately the current poverty level) with a "tax" of 50 percent. If the family has $2,000 in earnings, 50 percent of that amount, or $1,000, is subtracted from the base of $4,000. Thus the family has $3,000 from the program plus $2,000 of earnings, or $5,000.

Now suppose the family has $8,000 of earnings. Fifty percent of $8,000 is $4,000, which is subtracted from the $4,000 base amount so that the family gets nothing from the program and only the $8,000 of earnings. Under the stated assumptions, the "break-even point" is $8,000 and any 4-person family with less than that amount of earnings would get something additional from the program. Of course, with different specifications of the base amount or the tax rate, the amounts families would receive and the break-even point would also vary.

A major objective in a negative income tax program is for it always to be financially rewarding for a family member to shift from a non-work to a work status. This objective has to be reconciled with two other constraints that liberals nearly always accept. The first they share with the workfare proponents—that is, to hold down the overall cost of the program—although they would perhaps accept higher costs than the conservatives would agree to. The second is to provide payments at a decent level for those who can't work. Surprisingly, faced with these three constraints that I call the negative income tax dilemma—work incentive, cost and base payment paid to families with no wage earner—it's the base payment that is most likely to be given the lowest priority in welfare reform proposals based on the negative income tax. So as in AFDC and in workfare, it is the poorest children who are once more the victims.

Now the reason this happens in the negative income tax approach is that it is an all-embracing program intended to cover employables and unemployables alike. Indeed, the most enthusiastic negative income tax advocates would substitute it for all existing income protection programs, including social security, unemployment insurance and the income aspect of workmen's compensation as well as all forms of public assistance. Others don't go that far but nevertheless construct it so that it covers low-income people, working and non-working alike, and especially the transition from non-work to work.

It has to be said that nobody has come up with an acceptable solution to the negative income tax dilemma and I think it is highly unlikely that anyone will. As I have said, a fundamental principle of the negative income tax is that nobody should ever be better off if he is not working than if he is. It turns out, however, that because we have so many income or income-substitute programs (like food stamps, Medicaid and subsidized public housing), the so-called "notch" is always at least a theoretical possibility. The notch is simply an economist's term for the situation where the individual has a higher income not working than working.

The main reason this is considered so important is that the negative income tax is a universal program covering both employables and unemployables which, depending on the base level and the negative tax rate, may cover a very substantial proportion of the population and cost a lot of money. This makes it exceedingly vulnerable to the charge that it is rewarding people to remain idle. Since it does cover both those who can and ought to work and those who either can't work or at least ought not to be made to work, it results in a confusing picture which is difficult to sort out and easy for those with ulterior purposes to distort. And this is exactly what has happened because, to varying degrees, both the AFDC program in its present form (though not originally) and most alternatives liberals have proposed are based on negative income tax principles.

The answer, it seems to me, is not to depend on welfare, even if "reformed," to solve employment problems by providing work or even the incentive to work. Instead, what the nation really needs is an effective full employment policy, including a large-scale public service employment program, to provide suitable jobs at decent wages for everyone, not just welfare recipients. A commitment to this approach would reduce the number of those needing welfare assistance and tend to assure that those receiving welfare are among the least employable. In other words, it would tend to reduce the numbers and enhance the homogeneity of those forced to rely on welfare or whatever the residual income maintenance program is called. This would be all the more likely if, in addition to assuring jobs to employables, minimum wages were raised to a level that would keep all workers, except possibly those with very large families, out of poverty, unemployment insurance payments were raised from their present sub-poverty levels and National Health Security were enacted. If all of these things were done most families, except those without employables, would not need income supplementation from welfare or its substitute.

This brings me back to my original point—that welfare should concern itself primarily with the needs of the children dependent on it and not on the work or non-work of their mothers. This will be possible if it is recognized that most mothers on welfare should not be expected or even encouraged—and certainly not be required—to work. This does not mean that mothers will be prevented from getting off welfare by obtaining employment. With a full employment commitment, a large-scale public service employment program and higher minimum wages, many more mothers will undoubtedly be doing just that. I would hope that in these one-parent families, however, such mothers would not be encouraged to participate in training programs or to seek employment until meaningful and appropriate training and employment opportunities are provided, together with sufficient child care facilities and services. Today the shortage of child care resources is appalling, even for the children of mothers already working.

But no set of rules can be morally or ethically defensible if it allows the mother in a two-parent family to stay home and take care of her children, but tells the mother who is the only parent of her children that she must work or both she and her children will starve. It is all the more indefensible since because she is poor and because she is alone, the mother, where there is no father, has the heavier parental and household responsibilities. And if she is not forced to work but is expected to consider the physical and emotional needs of her children first, it won't make any difference if the welfare program does or does not include a perfect work incentive.

A work mandate applying to mothers with children is not ethical. Experience with it demonstrates that it is also undesirable from other standpoints.

Such a work mandate is based on the misconception that most welfare mothers don't want to work. What limited information we have does not bear this out. In fact, I would be tempted to argue that because welfare payments are so low, too many welfare mothers want to work for the good of their families.

A number of surveys which have been taken at various times have shown that the overwhelming majority of welfare mothers would be ready to take suitable jobs at decent pay if there were also a satisfactory way of having their children cared for. Leonard Goodwin's recent study, Do the Poor Want to Work?, has shown that the poor, including welfare recipients and their sons, "have a strong work ethic and do not need to be taught the importance of work. To encourage welfare mothers to enter the workforce, it is necessary to present them with a chance to experience success in jobs that will support them. . . . (But) working in jobs that do not pay them enough to support their families is likely to reinforce just those psychological orientations that characterize the poor and discourage them from further work activity. . . . The ways in which the poor differ from the affluent can reasonably be attributed to their different experiences of success and failure in the world."

One illustration of this strong work motivation is particularly interesting. A few months ago, the California Welfare Rights Organization joined with the National Organization for Women in a class action suit attacking alleged sex discrimination in the Work Incentive Program (WIN). WIN is the current work and training scheme in the welfare program which has had less than a shining success in placing registrants in training or trainees in jobs. Nevertheless, the petitioners charged that the California Department of Social Welfare was discouraging women from applying to WIN under regulations giving priority to unemployed men. They argued that female welfare recipients were denied critical job training. In view of the overwhelming proportion of women on welfare, they asked that 9 out of every 10 persons admitted to WIN be women.

This is all the more astonishing in light of the disastrous experience of WIN and similar non-federal mandatory work programs such as those in New York, Massachusetts and other states. A recent staff study by a subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress demonstrates what a failure WIN has been. Of about 2.25 million AFDC recipients "assessed" from July 1968 to the end of 1970, state welfare agencies found about 500,000 "appropriate for referral" to training or work. Actual referrals were just under 400,000 and enrollments were a bit more than half of that number. Shifting to April 30, 1972, of nearly 400,000 training enrollments, in almost four years, somewhat more than 250,000 completed their training but only 61,500 had successful completions, that is, had been on the job three to six months after placement. The study commented that in view of "the documented reluctance of employers to hire AFDC recipients, it is remarkable that WIN's placement rate is as high as it is."

It also stated: "Since there is evidence that WIN authorities creamed in selecting enrollees, the prospects for improved placement rates and for substantial reduction in welfare rolls by expanding a structurally unaltered program are not encouraging. . . . Reducing the large number of WIN participants who drop out for legitimate reasons is going to require improved labor market conditions, longer periods of training to provide greater skills and solutions to participants' health, transportation and family care problems, all of which may prove expensive."

One Labor Department official cited in Business Week magazine recently summed it all up: "I think it's fair to say that we've emphasized the preparation of people for work—as if the work were there."

In the prevailing situation of continuing high unemployment, especially for the unskilled and the inexperienced, it is no wonder that WIN and similar mandatory work and training programs have failed so miserably. But in addition to all the other problems of welfare recipients, they now have to contend with two bureaucracies which are often in conflict—the welfare agency and the employment service. They are shunted back and forth from one to the other, all too often losing their meager welfare check because they don't understand the regulations of one or the other agency, can't find transportation, are too sick or can't get anyone to take care of their children so they can show up when and where they are required to be. And yet, if they can somehow get through the whole obstacle course, including finding permanent child care services, the overwhelming majority winds up either jobless again or working in substandard employment at the most meager wages with no fringe benefits and with almost no job security. Yet on those very low incomes, they become ineligible for most means-tested health, food and housing programs and must somehow pay for child care as well as all their other regular family expenses.

Is there a legitimate "work ethic" which can compel mothers to offer themselves for training or work under such circumstances? Certainly these training and employment programs should be and can be improved—but mothers ought not be forced to participate in them under pain of loss of all income for themselves and their families.

But if genuine training programs led to suitable jobs with decent pay and adequate child care services, I have no doubt that far more mothers in what are now welfare families would voluntarily participate in such programs. Perhaps the most important prerequisite to assure such jobs is a greatly expanded public service employment program.

In summary, any genuine welfare reform must, first and foremost, emphasize the children's welfare. It should rely primarily on non-welfare programs to develop and assure suitable jobs at decent wages supplemented by improved social insurance, health security and other programs aimed at eliminating poverty. This will require a multi-faceted approach, but the one I would suggest is very different from the ideas which have been most popular in the academic community. These have tended to focus on some variant of the negative income tax as a single, all-embracing solution to poverty. Qualified academicians have devoted much time and effort to developing simulated models, pilot tests and other research studies which have produced a data base for the policy they espouse. But little work has been done to provide a research foundation for the multi-faceted approach I think is much more promising.

With this multi-faceted approach, welfare, or whatever it is called, could become a residual program providing a decent level of living to people who can't work at all or ought not to be required to work if they wish to devote themselves to their children's care. Under these circumstances, welfare would be far less costly and the "work ethic" would be irrelevant to welfare. The nation might even turn once again to helping instead of punishing the poor.

by Tom Kahn

This is a powerful, biting, yet carefully reasoned polemic against some of the more outrageous manifestations of anti-Americanism that were spawned by the New Left of the 1960s and, more importantly, came to dominate fashionable sections of the intellectual and academic world.

The author, happily, is no knee-jerk flagwaver, no crusty conservative clinging to the status quo, no mouthpiece for its privileged beneficiaries. Nor is he an anti-intellectual. Arnold Beichman, currently a political science professor at the University of Massachusetts, Boston, was years ago the city editor of the New York liberal newspaper PM, was a pioneer in international labor journalism and was denied a visa by South Africa to accompany Sen. Robert Kennedy there in 1965 because of what he had written about South Africa before. In short, he has good liberal and intellectual credentials.

What bothers Beichman, like so many others who have stood up to the intellectuals of the New Left, is the notion that basic social change must be fueled by hostility toward things American—American values, American institutions, even the American people themselves. That this hostility has become the creed not of society's real victims but of its more comfortable, protected and unoppressed elite suggests that underneath, it signifies not a resurgent radicalism but an old-fashioned conservative snobbism temporarily dressed in the vocabulary of revolution.

Beichman boils this creed down to "Nine Lies About America"—among them: America Is a Fascist Country; America Means Genocide; The American Worker Is a Honky; America Is Insane; America

Dear Professor Rowan:

It was thoughtful of you to send us a copy of your paper, "Discrimination and Apprentice Regulation in the Building Trades".

I hope you will send us copies of any further studies you or your colleagues do related to employment discrimination.

If you have not already done so I would suggest you send a copy to the persons listed on the attached sheet.

Dear Mr. Miller:

I have your invitation to be an observer at your Community Action Training Program for Appalachian trade-union leaders. I knew of the program and want to thank you very much for the invitation.

It is with real regret that I must face the facts of a pressing schedule and will not be able to be with you.

All good wishes for this conference. I would be happy to be kept informed of your other activities along this line. It is my understanding that W. H. Montague of the Georgia AFL-CIO will attend.

Sincerely,

Dear Mr. Via:

Robert Winn of our staff has suggested that you would be interested in observing our Community Action Training Program for Appalachian trade-union leaders.

We would be pleased to have you observe if you so desire. The second week of training will be held in the annex of the First Presbyterian Church of Morgantown, the week of April 24-29. Trainees will be housed at the Morgan Hotel.

Call me at 293-3323 if you have any questions about this.

Dear Mr. Via:

Arrangements have been completed to hold our August 12 evaluation conference at the newly opened Heart O'Town Motor Inn in Charleston, West Virginia.

(304) 343-4661

Room reservations can be made directly with the Inn, mentioning either the AFL-CIO Appalachian Council or the Institute for Labor Studies as the sponsoring party. The address of the Inn is Broad and Washington Streets, Charleston. If you prefer, reservations can be made through the West Virginia State Labor Federation office.

A meeting room has been reserved for all day and a lunch will be served. I would suggest that we begin at 9:30 A.M.

Thanks are due to Jim Nelson of the West Virginia Labor Federation for making these arrangements.

We are looking forward to meeting with you on the 12th.

Dear Emory:

I sent under separate cover the workbooks we used for our first two weeks of training. In addition, I have enclosed the course outline we discussed in Lexington.

We hope you can arrange to attend the meeting in Charleston on August 12. Let me hear from you when you make a final determination.

Dear Emory:

You are scheduled to make your presentation -- Title VII and Affirmative Action -- at 10:00 a.m. on Friday, February 28. Your presentation will last until about noon.

Carl Glatt, Executive Director of the West Virginia Human Rights Commission will precede you on the program. We have asked him to confine his remarks to purposes of the Human Rights Commission. Similarly your subject will not conflict with that of Lou Sherman. He will confine his remarks to the general subject of Labor Law -- specifically jurisdictional disputes and picketing. There may be some overlap with the remarks of J.B. Archer of the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training. However, the main thrust of his remarks will be directed towards projected skill needs and the effect of technology on the apprenticeship processes.

We are prepared to offer you an honorarium in lieu of expenses of $200. This includes air ($60 via Piedmont), hotel, meals, and taxi as expenses.

I am looking forward to seeing you in Charleston and I hope to be able to report some startling gossip of several kinds.

Fraternally,

Owen Tapper

Dear Mr. Glatt:

You are cordially invited to attend and to participate in the Second Winter Education Conference of the West Virginia Building and Construction Trades Council. This conference is being held at the Heart-O-Town Motel in Charleston on February 26, 27, 28.

Your presentation is scheduled for 9:00 a.m. on February 28. We hope that you will take approximately 30 to 45 minutes to tell us of the purposes of and the work of the Human Rights Commission.

Following your presentation Dr. Emory Via of the Southern Regional Council in Atlanta will handle a session entitled "Title VII (of the Civil Rights Act) and Affirmative Action" in the construction industry.

You are certainly invited to remain for this session.

Enclosed is a conference brochure.

Sincerely,

Owen A. Tapper

MEMORANDUM

TO: EMORY VIA

FROM: GLENDA BARTLEY

Attached is a map of West Virginia, showing the fourteen counties in the top quartile of Negro population. West Virginia's total population is 1,860,421, of which 89,378 (4.8) are Negro. The Negro population of the top quartile counties ranges from 22.3 per cent of the total 71,359 in McDowell (a relatively populous southern county which borders on Virginia) to 3.8 per cent of northern Hancock's 39,615. There are only two counties in the state with over 100,000 total population. Both Cabell (Huntington) and Kanawha (Charleston) are in the top quartile.

Labor Seeks $1 Billion for Slum Housing

MIAMI BEACH, Fla. Feb. 10 (AP) — Labor officials launched a campaign to raise $1 billion in union money to invest in low-cost housing to help rebuild city slums.

"It will give you a secure investment, a reasonable interest yield, create jobs for yourself and your community and do a job the Nation needs in rebuilding city ghetto areas." John E. Evans told leaders of 17 AFL-CIO construction unions.

Evans, director of the AFL-CIO's recently created Department of Urban Affairs, said he will make an individual pitch to the presidents of all 125 AFL-CIO unions to put pension, welfare and other union funds into the labor federation's mortgage investment trust, which now totals $11 million.

"There was healthy discussion, none of it negative. There was a great deal of indication of interest," Evans said afterward.

He said he already has verbal pledges of about $8 million in new union money for the fund.

SUBTITLE A-OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF LABOR-NONDISCRIMINATION IN APPRENTICESHIP

Title 29—LABOR

Subtitle A—Office of the Secretary of Labor

PART 30—NONDISCRIMINATION IN APPRENTICESHIP AND TRAINING

On October 23, 1963, notice of the substance of proposed rules regarding equality of opportunity in apprenticeship and training was published in the FEDERAL REGISTER (28 F.R. 11313). Interested persons were given 15 days in which to submit written statements of data, views, and arguments concerning the proposal. Having considered all relevant material submitted, I have decided to, and do hereby establish a new 29 CFR Part 30, effective January 17, 1964, to read as follows:

Sec.
30.1 Scope and purpose.
30.2 Definitions.
30.3 Equal opportunity standards.
30.4 Selection of apprentices.
30.5 Necessary action on prior application lists.
30.6 Nondiscriminatory operation.
30.7 Formal nondiscrimination provisions.
30.8 New registrations.
30.9 Program reviews.
30.10 Review by Regional Director.
30.11 Review by Administrator.
30.12 Complaint procedure.
30.13 Adjustments in schedules for program review or complaint processing.
30.14 Reinstatement of program registration.

Sec.
30.15 Quota system barred.
30.16 State agencies.

AUTHORITY: §§ 30.1 to 30.16 issued under 50 Stat. 665, R.S. 161; 29 U.S.C. 50, 5 U.S.C. 22.

§ 30.1 Scope and purpose.

This part sets forth policies and procedures to promote equality of opportunity in apprenticeship and training programs registered with the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training. These policies apply to the selection of apprentices, to waiting lists, and to employment during apprenticeship, and the procedures established provide for review of apprenticeship programs, for processing complaints, for deregistering noncomplying programs and for registering new programs. Provision is also made for cooperative relationships with appropriate State agencies. The purpose of this part is to promote equality of opportunity and to prevent discrimination based on race, creed, color or national origin in all phases of apprenticeship.

§ 30.2 Definitions.

(a) "Bureau" means the Bureau of Apprenticeship and Training.

(b) "Administrator", "Regional Director", and "field representative" mean the Administrator, the Regional Directors and the field representatives of the Bureau.

(c) "Program" means an apprenticeship program registered with the Bureau.

(d) "Employer" means any person or organization employing an apprentice whether or not the apprentice is indentured to such person or organization or to some other person or organization.

(e) "Program sponsor" means any person or organization operating an apprenticeship program, irrespective of whether such person or organization is an employer.

§ 30.3 Equal opportunity standards.

Each apprenticeship program registered with the Bureau shall operate on the basis of the following standards:

(a) The selection of apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone, in accordance with objective standards which permit review after full and fair opportunity for application, unless the selections otherwise made would themselves demonstrate that there is equality of opportunity.

(b) The taking of whatever steps are necessary, in acting upon application lists developed prior to this time, to remove the effects of previous practices under which discriminatory patterns of employment may have resulted.

(c) Nondiscrimination in all phases of apprenticeship and employment during apprenticeship after selections are made.

§ 30.4 Selection of apprentices.

Apprentices may be selected by any of the methods prescribed in paragraphs (a), (b) or (c) of this section.

(a) Selection on the basis of qualifications alone. (1) (i) Selection "on the basis of qualifications alone" means that apprentices are chosen from those applicants meeting the minimum qualifications for the trade or craft solely on the basis of their qualifications compared to those of other applicants. Examples of standards by which comparative qualifications may be determined are fair aptitude tests, school diplomas, age requirements, occupationally essential physical requirements, fair interviews, school grades and previous work experience. Under this test, both actual selection for and entry into apprenticeship must be on the basis of comparative qualifications alone. It is not enough for a program sponsor to establish a lengthy list on the basis of minimum qualifications standards and then select apprentices from the list on a basis other than comparative qualifications, such as on the basis of time of application.

(ii) Where the number of applicants meeting the minimum qualifications requirements is greater than the number of job openings, "qualifications alone" means (a) that the applicants are ranked on the basis of criteria which measure comparative qualifications (e.g., fair aptitude tests, etc.) and are selected on the basis of the rankings, or (b) that without ranking each individual, criteria which measure comparative qualifications are used to identify the "best qualified" in a total number not in excess of the total number of apprentice openings and the order of selection for employment from within the "best qualified" group is determined through any nondiscriminatory system.

(2) "Objective standards" means that qualifications and eligibility must be determined by specific requirements so that questions of discrimination in selection can be fairly adjudicated. It does not mean that all programs must have identical standards for selection. Requirements must be established and disseminated publicly prior to selection. (See § 30.4(a)(4).)

(3) To "permit review" adequate records of the selection process must be kept and made available to the Bureau upon request. These must include a brief summary of each interview and the conclusions on each of the specific factors, e.g., motivation, ambition, willingness to accept direction, which are part of the total judgment. Such records must be retained for at least two years.

(4) "After full and fair opportunity for application" means, with respect to application lists developed prior to January 17, 1964, that in the development of the list the program sponsor had publicly disseminated information about the availability of apprenticeship opportunities and had allowed a substantial period of time for applicants to apply. After January 17, 1964, "After full and fair opportunity for application" means that the program sponsor, prior to time of selection and at least once annually, except in years when no selections are made, has allowed a substantial period of time for new applicants to apply and former applicants to reapply for apprenticeship, has publicly disseminated full information about the availability of apprenticeship opportunities, and has ranked the new applicants thus received along with previous applicants on the basis of their comparative qualifications. After January 17, 1964, such information shall be posted at the normal place of application for apprenticeship and disseminated to the local employment service and the local schools, except that where selection is made exclusively from a restricted pool (see § 30.4(c)), information need not be disseminated to the local employment service and the local schools.

(b) Selections demonstrating equality of opportunity.

(1) Apprentices may be selected in any manner in which the selections themselves demonstrate equality of opportunity.

(2) Apprentices may also be selected in accordance with any plan which assures equality of opportunity and which is acceptable to the Administrator.

(c) Selection from existing employees. Where apprentices are selected from a restricted pool, e.g., from present employees, admissions to the pool as well as selection for apprenticeship must be on a nondiscriminatory basis after January 17, 1964. Selections from the pools may be made on the basis of seniority of employment.

§ 30.5 Necessary action on prior application lists.

Where program sponsors have or adopt a selection system based on qualifications alone as specified in § 30.4(a), the standard stated in § 30.3(b) does not require any action with regard to "application lists developed prior to this time" beyond that required by § 30.4(a). Where program sponsors do not have a selection system based on qualifications alone, the standard stated in § 30.3(b) requires that "application lists developed prior to this time" be opened to the extent necessary to provide current opportunities for selection of qualified members of racial and ethnic minority groups.

§ 30.6 Nondiscriminatory operation.

There must be no discrimination in apprenticeship or employment during apprenticeship after selections have been made, including but not limited to job assignment, promotion, layoff or termination, rates of pay or other forms of compensation or conditions of work. All apprentices employed shall be subject to the same job performance requirements.

§ 30.7 Formal nondiscrimination provisions.

(a) Formal provision required. Except as provided in § 30.7(b), each program registered with the Bureau must contain in its formal apprenticeship standards or in its underlying collective bargaining agreement a formal nondiscrimination provision which is consistent with the standards in § 30.3. The Bureau suggests the following language as appropriate for adoption by program sponsors desiring to select apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone: "Selection of apprentices under the program shall be made from qualified applicants on the basis of qualifications alone and without regard to race, creed, color, national origin, sex, or occupationally irrelevant physical requirements in accordance with objective standards which permit review, after full and fair opportunity for application; and this program shall be operated on a completely nondiscriminatory basis."

(b) Previously registered programs. Programs registered prior to January 17, 1964, which contain the following provision or generally equivalent language are not required to revise such language in order to comply with paragraph (a): "Selection of apprentices under this program shall be made from qualified applicant without regard to race, creed, color, national origin or physical handicaps; women shall not be barred from apprenticeships for which they qualify."

(c) Equal opportunity standards applicable. Irrespective of the form of the formal nondiscrimination clause adopted or in use, all federally registered programs are required to operate in accordance with the equal opportunity standards in § 30.3 as interpreted in this part.

§ 30.8 New registrations.

Any program sponsor seeking federal registration of a program after January 17, 1964, must select apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone in accordance with objective standards which permit review after full and fair opportunity for application and must adopt a nondiscrimination clause in the form suggested in § 30.7(a) or its equivalent. In addition to the formal provision requirement, the submission to the Bureau must include a concise statement of the selection procedure and of the selection standards which the program sponsor proposes to apply.

§ 30.9 Program reviews.

The Bureau shall conduct a systematic field review of existing federally registered programs, inform program sponsors of the equal opportunity standards, encourage their adoption, and take appropriate action regarding programs which do not adopt and operate in accordance with the standards. Each program field review shall involve the following steps:

(a) Notification to the program sponsor of the equal opportunity standards and the taking of all appropriate action to urge their voluntary acceptance.

(b) Maintenance of a file on the program field review: The file shall accompany the report forwarded by the field representative.

(c) Determination of racial and ethnic composition of the program: Where the composition of the program demonstrates that there is equality of opportunity no further field review will be made. A file shall be maintained regarding such programs, which will contain the information which indicates that equal opportunity is being provided. This file shall be forwarded through supervisory channels to the Administrator for review.

(d) Use of the following checklist where further field review is required:

(1) The formal program language requirement. Does the program contain a formal nondiscrimination clause consistent with the equal opportunity standards in § 30.3? (Programs already containing language generally equivalent to that required by Bureau Circular 62-5 are not required to adopt new written provisions. See § 30.7.)

(2) Selection of apprentices:

(i) Selection on the basis of qualifications alone: Does the program select apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone in accordance with objective standards which permit review after full and fair opportunity for application? (See § 30.4(a)), and is the application list composed entirely of applicants selected and ranked solely on the basis of qualifications alone in accordance with objective standards that permit review after full and fair opportunity for application? (See §§ 30.4(a)(4) and 30.5.)

(ii) Alternative selection plan: If the program does not select apprentices on the basis of qualifications alone, has the program adopted an alternative equal opportunity plan for selecting apprentices which assures equality of opportunity and which is acceptable to the Administrator? Does the program operate in accordance with such plan? Field representatives should submit through channels to the Administrator for approval alternative selection plans which appear to assure equal opportunity. A copy of the approved plan should be included in the case file.

(3) Program operation: Is there any discrimination in apprenticeship or employment during apprenticeship, including but not limited to job assignment, promotion, demotion, layoff, or termination, rates of pay or other forms of compensation or conditions of work? (See § 30.6.)

(e) Where the program sponsor has not adopted or is not operating in accordance with the equal opportunity standards in § 30.3, the field representative shall notify the program sponsor in writing (even in group programs where it is an individual employer who is deficient) and indicate possible methods of providing equal opportunity in accordance with this document. For a reasonable time, not to exceed 30 days from the time the program sponsor is notified of the lack of equal opportunity, the field representative shall make every reasonable effort to encourage corrective action, recording the facts and information in the case report. This effort to obtain corrective action shall include an opportunity for any body designated by the program sponsor or industry group for reviewing complaints of discrimination to resolve the issue.

§ 30.10 Review by Regional Director.

(a) Forwarding of file. At the close of the field review for programs found to be in conformity, or at the close of the time allowed for voluntary corrective action for programs found not to be in conformity, the field representative shall forward the case file with his recommendations through supervisory channels to the Regional Director for review.

(b) Conformity findings. The Regional Director shall review findings of conformity or achievement of corrective action on a spot check basis in sufficient proportion to assure himself that the Bureau's equal opportunity policy is being properly carried out. Where upon review the Regional Director does not concur in the findings of the field representative, he may order further investigation or such other action as may be necessary and appropriate.

(c) Nonconformity findings. Upon receipt of any finding of nonconformity by a field representative, the Regional Director shall notify the program sponsor in writing that such a finding has been made, of the facts on which the finding is based, and that the program will be deregistered unless the finding is set aside or appropriate corrective action taken. The program sponsor shall have 15 days from the date of receipt of the notification within which to file a written request for a hearing with the Regional Director.

(1) Hearing not requested. If the program sponsor does not request a hearing within 15 days, the Regional Director shall review the case. Where, upon review, the Regional Director concurs in the finding of noncompliance and failure to achieve satisfactory corrective action, he shall so notify the program sponsor and the complainant, if any, and shall forward the case file to the Administrator, stating his concurrence and his recommendations, if any. Where, upon review, the Regional Director does not concur in the finding of the field representative, he may order further investigation or such other action as may be necessary and appropriate.

(2) Hearing procedure. If the program sponsor within 15 days of receipt of the notice files a written request, the program sponsor shall be accorded a hearing before a hearing officer designated by the Under Secretary of Labor. The hearing shall be informally conducted. Every party shall have the right to counsel and a fair opportunity to present its case or defense, including a right of cross-examination. The hearing officer shall prepare a decision on the basis of the record before him, setting forth findings and conclusions on the question of noncompliance and recommendations, if any. Copies of the decision shall be furnished to the program sponsor, and the complainant, if any. The decision shall be final except that any program sponsor as to whom the decision is adverse may file exceptions with the Administrator within 15 days of its receipt. If exceptions are filed and if there is a complainant, a copy of the exceptions filed shall be furnished to him and he shall be given 15 days in which to file a reply with the Administrator. A copy of such reply shall be furnished to the program sponsor.

§ 30.11 Review by Administrator.

(a) Voluntary corrective action. Upon receipt of the Regional Director's concurrence in the finding of the field representative or of a decision of a hearing officer that a program is not in conformity, the Administrator shall so inform any private organization designated by the industry in question to assist in achieving equal opportunity and shall allow the organization a reasonable time, normally not to exceed 20 days, to achieve voluntary corrective action.

(b) Final determination. Following the receipt of exceptions and replies to be filed or the expiration of the time for action provided for in paragraph (a) of this section, the Administrator shall render a final decision in writing based on the file or the record as the case may be. If the decision is that the program is in nonconformity and that satisfactory action to achieve conformity has not been taken, the program shall be deregistered. The Administrator shall notify the Regional Director, the program sponsor, the complainant, if any, and any private organizations of the type described in paragraph (a) of this section. In each case in which deregistration is ordered the Administrator will make public notice of the order and will notify the President's Committee on Equal Employment Opportunity and the Solicitor of Labor.

§ 30.12 Complaint procedure.

(a) Filing. Any applicant or apprentice who believes that he has been discriminated against on the basis of race, creed, color, or national origin with regard to apprenticeship or that the equal opportunity standards have not been followed in his case may file a complaint with the Bureau or any field representative. The complaint shall be in writing and shall be signed by the complainant. It must include the name, address and the telephone number of the person allegedly discriminated against, the program sponsor involved and brief description of the circumstances of the alleged discrimination or failure to follow equal opportunity standards. Complaints received by the Bureau Headquarters Office will be transmitted to the field for processing. The complaint must be filed not later than 180 days from the date of the alleged discrimination or specified failure to follow equal opportunity standards; and in the case of complaints filed directly with private review bodies designated by program sponsors to review such complaints, any referral of such complaint by the complainant to the Bureau or any field representative must occur within the time limitation stated above or 30 days from the final decision of such body, whichever is later. The time may be extended by the Administrator for good cause shown. Local program sponsors should be immediately encouraged to establish, either individually or in an industry group, fair, speedy, and effective procedures for reviewing complaints of discrimination.

(b) Processing of complaints. Upon receipt of any complaint the field representative shall:

(1) Prepare and maintain a complete case file for each complaint received. It shall contain the original complaint, reports of investigations and visits, and correspondence with the employer, the program sponsor, and others regarding all phases of the case in chronological order, including recommendations made and final disposition of the case. This file shall be forwarded to the Regional Director for review upon local disposition of each complaint. A separate local office correspondence and reports file shall be maintained for essential internal records and correspondence regarding each case.

(2) When the program sponsor or an industry group has designated a body for reviewing complaints of discrimination, the field representative, upon receiving a complaint, shall establish a case file and direct the complainant to file his complaint with the representative of the review body. He shall give the complainant the name and address of this representative.

(3) No later than 60 days following the filing of a complaint with the review body by the complainant the field representative shall obtain reports from the complainant and the review body of the disposition of the complaint. If the complaint has been satisfactorily adjusted and there is no other indication of failure to apply equal opportunity standards, the case shall be closed and the parties appropriately informed.

(4) When a complaint has not been resolved through local review procedures within 60 days, where no local review procedure exists or where despite satisfactory resolution of the complaint, there is evidence that the equal opportunity practices of the program are not in accordance with these rules, the field representative shall notify the program sponsor of the complaint or such evidence, solicit a response from the program sponsor and conduct whatever other investigation is necessary to determine the facts, including where necessary, interrogation of the complainant, the employer and the other involved persons. The pertinent facts shall be recorded.

(5) Where the program is not operating in accordance with the equal opportunity standards, the field representative shall notify the program sponsor (even in group programs where it is an individual employer who is deficient) and indicate possible methods of providing equal opportunity in accordance with these regulations. For a reasonable time, not to exceed 15 days from the time the program sponsor is notified of the lack of equal opportunity, the field representative shall make every reasonable effort to encourage corrective action, recording the facts and information in the case report.

(6) From this point on, complaints shall be processed procedurally in the same manner as program reviews. (See §§ 30.10–11.)

§ 30.13 Adjustments in schedule for program review or complaint processing.

If, in the judgment of the Administrator, a particular situation warrants and requires special processing and either expedited or extended determination, he shall take the steps necessary to permit such determination if he finds that no person or party affected by such determination will be prejudiced by such special processing.

§ 30.14 Reinstatement of program registration.

Any program deregistered pursuant to these regulations may be reinstated upon presentation of adequate evidence to the Administrator that the program has established and is operating under a selection system based on qualifications alone and is in compliance with § 30.3(c).

§ 30.15 Quota system barred.

Nothing contained in this part shall be construed to require any program sponsor or employer to select or employ apprentices in the proportion which their race, color, religion, or national origin bears to the total population.

§ 30.16 State agencies.

(a) (1) Regional Directors shall encourage State Apprenticeship Council (SAC) States to adopt and implement the equal opportunity standards set forth in § 30.3 and to adopt effective procedures to implement the standards including program reviews, the processing of complaints, deregistration of noncomplying programs, and the consultation and cooperation with private organizations designated by the industry in question to assist in achieving equal opportunity in apprenticeship. Regional Directors shall submit the State equal opportunity programs to the Administrator for determination of their consistency with such equal opportunity standards.

(2) Where State programs are determined to be consistent with such equal opportunity standards, Regional Directors shall work out with SAC States a division of responsibilities between Federal and State personnel for carrying out the procedures adopted to implement the policy.

(3) When the Administrator determines that a State program is not consistent with such standards, he shall notify the Secretary of Labor that a question exists as to whether the Federal Government should continue to recognize, for Federal purposes, programs registered by the State agency.

(b) Regional Directors shall request that SAC State agencies notify them of any State deregistration. Regional Directors shall then notify the Administrator who will in turn notify the President's Committee on Equal Opportunity and the Solicitor of Labor.

(c) Regional Directors shall consult with State officials regarding methods of cooperation with State fair employment practices commissions and shall report the results of such consultations to the Administrator with recommendations for coordination of activities and for a division of responsibilities where appropriate.

Signed at Washington, D.C., this thirteenth of December 1963.

A FEW NOTES ON SAFETY LEGISLATION

Amended Safety Bill Advances: House Labor Committee reports revised legislation relating to federal occupational safety and health standards after writing in additional amendments which further diminish bill's resemblance to original Administration proposal. One change makes it mandatory, rather than optional, for Secretary of Labor to adopt "national consensus" standard when one exists.

Construction Safety Bill Fails In House: House, under suspension of rules, votes 196 to 126 for substitute construction safety bill (H.R. 2567) but is short of required two-thirds majority. Measure would have amended Contract Work Hours Standards Act to bar contractors from employing tradesmen on federally financed or assisted projects under "unsanitary, hazardous, or dangerous" conditions.

House Vote On Safety Bill Decried: Assistant Secretary of Labor Esther Peterson labels as "disgraceful" and "incredible" the failure of House to pass bill to establish construction safety standards. She blames "powerful private interests" who oppose effective measures necessary to cut "tragically high rate of deaths and disabling injuries".

NOTES ON PREVAILING WAGE PROBLEMS

Unions Lose Prevailing Wage Appeal: Davis-Bacon Wage Appeals Board affirms decision of Solicitor of Labor that prevailing heavy-highway, not building, rates are applicable to initial contract work for site preparation, clearing, grading, and drainage in connection with construction of giant Dallas-Fort Worth Regional Airport. Board rejects contention of building trades that because work is part of "overall planned undertaking" building rates should be considered prevailing for all phases of airport project.

WAB Turns Down Petition As Untimely: Davis-Bacon Wage Appeals Board declines to review case of contractor who did not file proper appeal from decision of Solicitor of Labor until 10 months after decision. Board calls review petition by Jack Picault untimely.

GAO Criticizes Housing Unit Determinations: Reviewing wage rate determinations issued for four military family housing and low-rent public housing projects in Washington, D.C., area, Comptroller General takes Labor Department to task for applying negotiated rates paid on commercial building construction rather than on lower scales prevailing for comparable private residential construction. He says "more realistic" determinations could produce substantial cost savings to government on national basis.

Wage Case Again Returned To Solicitor: In what is described as "close, difficult" case relating to administration of Davis-Bacon Act, Wage Appeals Board for second time instructs Solicitor of Labor to include rates paid on certain highway projects of similar character in making minimum wage determination covering levee construction contract in Jefferson County, Tex. AGC challenged Solicitor's reissuance of wage decision based solely on heavy construction projects.

WAB Remands Case For Additional Facts: Davis-Bacon Wage Appeals Board instructs Solicitor of Labor to clarify evidence underlying his wage determination applicable to operators of small dredges on highway project near Savannah, Ga. Ordering reconsideration of decision, Board says appealing contractor has not affirmatively shown that determination was erroneous but that its factual basis is "confused enough" to warrant gathering of more evidence as to prevailing wage practices in Georgia.

WAB To Hear Previously-Rejected Case: In light of unusual circumstances growing out of contractor's attempt to pursue two channels of appeal, Davis-Bacon Wage Appeals Board cancels prior ruling that petition for review was untimely filed and decides to hear case on its merits. Question at issue is whether contractor employing apprentices operating under program registered in New York is obliged to pay rates established by that program or rates prevailing for apprentices in New Jersey areas where his jobs are located.

D-B Protection Applies Fully To Apprentices, Panel Holds: As laborers and mechanics within meaning of Davis-Bacon Act, apprentices are entitled to be paid rates prevailing in area where project work is being performed, Wage Appeals Board decides, and Labor Department's action in 1964 eliminating listing of apprentice rates in wage determinations in no way impaired this protection. Opinion comes in case in which outstate contractor employing apprentices registered under New York program maintained he was justified in paying rates fixed by this program on projects undertaken in New Jersey. Board finds that payment of rates other than those prevailing in New Jersey would be "totally inconsistent" with purpose of Act.

NOTES ON JURISDICTIONAL PROBLEMS

Sheet Metal Workers Lose "Metal Pan" Dispute: NLRB rejects claim of Sheet Metal Workers to portion of work involved in installing "metal pan" acoustical ceilings at construction site in Lincoln, Neb., and upholds employer's assignment of all tasks necessary to complete ceilings to his own work crews, who were members of Carpenters. Board says dispute is not moot by virtue of fact disputed work has been completed since there is no showing similar jurisdictional arguments will not erupt in area in future.

NLRB Overrules Joint Board Jurisdiction Award: Rejecting contention of Operating Engineers that award of National Joint Board for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes should be accorded controlling weight, NLRB decides that it is outweighed by other factors favoring assignment of power equipment operation at Virginia construction site to IBEW-represented employees. In holding that Joint Board award is not determinative of dispute, NLRB says employing contractor was not bound to Joint Board and that panel's decision did not specify reasons for awarding work to Engineers.

Operating Engineers Lose In Power Line Dispute: National Labor Relations Board rejects contentions of Operating Engineers, upholds assignment of disputed work on underground utility line to members of IBEW. Board's economy and efficiency criterion was clincher for IBEW. Work in dispute involved operation of hydrolift, welding machine, winch, and pumps on Utility Service Corporation project in Stamford, Conn.

Spray Gun Dispute Decided In Contractor's Favor: Arbitrator Ben Nathanson rules for Pete King Corp., Phoenix, Ariz., represented by Painting and Decorating Contractors Association, that cement ceilings of Oakland, Calif., postal distribution center may be sprayed where hangers, ducts, and pipes make use of rollers "laboriously impractical."

NLRB Awards Conveyor Installation To Millwrights: Sifting conflicting claims of Millwrights and Machinists to installation of overhead conveyor system at Indiana brewery, National Labor Relations Board decides in favor of Millwrights employed by outside contractor. Company practice, contractor's agreement with Brotherhood of Carpenters, comparative skills, and efficiency of operation are deciding factors, AFL-CIO Arbiter Sustains Raiding Charge: AFL-CIO Umpire David L. Cole upholds complaint of Marble Workers in Atlanta that Laborers violated Federation's Internal Disputes Plan by attempting to undermine its established collective bargaining relationships in seeking recognition as bargaining agent for tile setter helpers represented by Marble Workers. Cole rejects LIU argument that squabble was jurisdictional in nature, precluding settlement under Internal Disputes.

Trenching Work Awarded To Electricians: In case involving dispute over hand digging and backfilling of trenches for electrical conduit, NLRB determines that contractor in Louisville was justified in hiring IBEW groundmen to replace members of Laborers initially assigned to job after learning that IBEW-represented workers were available to perform work. Board relies on employer's customary practice, under its bargaining agreement with Electricians, of using workers represented by IBEW when they are available.

Engineers Win Barge Work Dispute: While noting that disputed work bears close relationship to tasks traditionally performed in maritime industry, National Labor Relations Board decides members of Operating Engineers, not Longshoremen, are entitled to job of loading and unloading imported borrow transported by river barges to California highway construction site. Award, limited to facts of case, upholds work assignments of contractors which were challenged by two waterfront locals.

Shopmen's Dispute Resolved In Employer's Favor: Jurisdictional dispute arising from acquisition of one fabricating company by owners of another is resolved by National Labor Relations Board on ground that two companies remain separate employers. Owners' contract with Sheet Metal Workers does not cover new plant, Board holds, thus continued use of Electricians to paint electrical control panels and boxes is justified by established practice, IBEW's contract, and economy and efficiency of operation.

Sheet Metal Workers Lose Spray Booth Wrangle: NLRB rejects claim of Sheet Metal Workers in Escanaba, Mich., to jurisdiction over task of erecting traveling paint spray booth to be installed in new building under construction. Panel decides that manufacturer for whom new facility was being built properly assigned its own UAW-represented production and maintenance workers to perform job. Because disputed work does not require superior skills of sheet metal workers, Board comments, award of job to them would resultin their "substantial underutilization."

NLRB Awards Scaffolding Work To Laborers: Turning down claim of Carpenters, who took case to National Joint Board, NLRB decides that members of Laborers employed by masonry subcontractor at Iowa City construction site are entitled to work of erecting and mismantling all-metal tubular scaffolding. NLRB bases award primarily on factor of economy and efficiency, plus jurisdictional clause in national contract between mason contractors and Laborers International Union.

Carpenters Lose Again On Masonry Scaffolding: For second time within a week, and again primarily for reason of economy and efficiency of operation, National Labor Relations Board rejects Carpenters' claim to jurisdiction over erection of prefabricated metal scaffolding for outside masonry work on high rise building. Contrary to National Joint Board determination, NLRB awards disputed work at University of Alabama Medical Center project in Birmingham to mason tenders represented by Laborers.

AFL-CIO Umpire Rejects Charge Against Laborers: Pointing out that jurisdictional disputes are excluded from AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan, Impartial Umpire, Howard W. Kleeb, limits his decision on complaint filed by United Association against Laborers International Union to narrow question of whether UA had "established work relationship" entitling its members to lay underground pipe at Bechtel Corporation refinery project in Robinson, Ill. He decides to the contrary, declaring issue can be resolved only by National Joint Board for Settlement of Jurisdictional Disputes.

Carpenters Win Fume Hood Dispute: Determining jurisdictional dispute between Carpenters and Sheet Metal Workers, NLRB sees no reason to overturn employer's assignment to Carpenters of work of installing fume hoods as part of complete sets of laboratory furniture being moved into building at University of West Virginia. Skills and experience needed to perform work are those of carpenters, not sheet metal workers, Board says. Determination is applied to employer's jobsites throughout West Virginia in view of likely recurrence of dispute.

NLRB Awards Equipment Operation To Electricians: Declining company's request that it frame definition of "inside" and "outside" work on power generating station project, Labor Board holds that IBEW members are entitled by industry, company, and area practice and in interests of economy and efficiency to operate hydrocranes, holediggers, ditchwitches, bulldozers, and any similar equipment in connection with installation of steel towers on Kentucky Power Company site. Operating Engineers' claims to work are rejected.

NOTES ON NLRB AND COURT DECISIONS

Carpenters' Pre-Hire Contract Held Invalid: NLRB Trial Examiner Martin S. Bennett decides that Arizona manufacturer of furniture and cabinets is not engaged primarily in construction industry, thus its pre-hire agreement with Carpenters is invalid and union's picketing to enforce agreement was unlawful recognition picketing. Since less than one-third of company's business is installation work, Bennett says it would be "a case of the tail wagging the dog" to say company is engaged primarily in construction.

Four-Year-Old Certification Still "Fresh": IBEW local remains certified representative of Colorado electrical contractors' employees even though it has not been able in four years to negotiate first contract, NLRB Trail Examiner Herbert Corenman holds. Charge of unlawful recognition picketing is dismissed.

Court Orders Daniel To Produce Voter List: Federal court in South Carolina orders Daniel Construction Company to submit to NLRB regional director names and addresses of employees and former employees eligible to vote in six-state election on representation by United Association. Court, however, says union can communicate with former employees "solely by mail," in order that it not have unfair advantage over company.

Safety Confab Held Protected Activity: NLRB agrees with trial examiner that company employed on bridge project in Idaho unlawfully discharged and refused to rehire crew of piledrivers who met to discuss "abnormally dangerous" working conditions. Safety meeting was approved by company agent and constituted concerted activity guaranteed by Section 7 of Taft-Hartley Act, Board holds.

Court Backs Ouster Of Local President; Sixth Circuit reverses lower court and decides Sheet Metal Workers International Association was justified in expelling from membership president of local union on grounds other than that he had circulated letter libeling international officers. Appeals court stresses finding of union trial board and executive council that any of four charges on which he was convicted would warrant his expulsion, and only one of these involved libelous letter which district court held was protected by Landrum-Griffin's free-speech proviso.

Operating Engineers Win Subcontracting Beef: Arbitrator Clair V. Duff decides general contractor at University of Pittsburgh building site was obligated under contract with union to provide engineer at sump pump when only subcontractor's employees were on job. "Make-work" argument, Duff says, "may be persuasive at the bargaining table, but it cannot change the negotiated bargain of the parties".

Refusal To Bargain Complaint Dismissed: NLRB trial examiner concludes that Plumbers in Nashville did not verbally agree to accept contract identical to that negotiated by Steamfitters with contractors association, and that, in consequence, union's refusal to sign did not constitute bad-faith bargaining.

Florida Court Cancels Anti-Picket Order: Appeals court in Florida dissolves injunction issued by lower court at request of project owners against picketing by Laborers at construction site near Florida State University campus. Court says dispute lies within exclusive jurisdiction of NLRB and state has no authority to intervene.

Case Of Fined Member Denied Review: Supreme Court rejects petition to review NLRB finding that union unlawfully caused employers to deny employment to worker whose union membership had been cancelled for refusal to pay disciplinary fine.

Right To Sue Upheld By Federal Court: Federal district court in New York rules that former members of union have right to sue under Section 301 of Taft-Hartley Act over alleged violation of bargaining agreement stemming from complaint that union-management trustees improperly diverted money from annuity, welfare, and pension funds. Plaintiffs have standing to sue as individuals, court says, and fact that they are former employees and union members makes no difference in their legal right to seek contract enforcement.

Illegality Of Product Boycott Reaffirmed: After taking second look at case at direction of Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals, NLRB affirms finding that Asbestos Workers in Hamilton, Ohio, conducted unlawful secondary boycott by refusing to install precut insulation jacketing at jobsite. Work of manufacturing jacketing was not reserved to union members by bargaining agreement, Board says, nor was it work "regularly or traditionally" performed by them.

Bargaining Unit Pull-Out Held Invalid: NLRB affirms finding of trail examiner that move by California roofing contractor to withdraw from association and go nonunion after start of multi-employer bargaining was neither timely nor unequivocal and that, as consequence, he was bound to sign and abide by master contract subsequently negotiated by employer association and Roofers.

Strike-Breaking Fines No Business of Contractor: NLRB Trial Examiner David S. Davidson holds that Florida air conditioning contractor violated obligation to bargain in good faith by refusing to sign agreement with Local 583 of United Association unless union agreed to lift fines imposed on some of his employees for continuing to work during strike. Fines, Davidson says, were internal union matter and not mandatory subject of bargaining.

Picketing At Reserved Gate Found Unlawful: NLRB trial examiner holds that Electricians in Glendale, Ariz., violated secondary boycott ban by posting pickets at entrance to construction site set aside for neutral union employers in course of dispute with unorganized subcontractor. Examiner finds no evidence that employees of picketed subcontractor used neutral gate instead of one set aside for them, or that they even worked at site during two days at issue.

Picketing In Two Circumstances Deemed Unlawful: NLRB trial examiner decides that picketing by Electricians at Texas construction site both before and after reserved gates were established constituted secondary boycott -- before, because employees of subcontractor with whom union had dispute were not working during time of picketing, and, after, because union picketed at entrance set aside for exclusive use of neutral employers.

Court Questions NLRB Rule In Prefab Disputes: Looking for second time at "packaged boiler" cases in Minneapolis-St. Paul, Eighth Circuit decides that contractor's "right of control" over products to be installed at construction site is not crucial in determining legality of union attempts to enforce work-preservation agreements. Fact that contractor is bound by job specifications to use prefabricated product is relevant consideration, court says, but it's not controlling, as maintained by NLRB. In companion decision, court also construes Supreme Court's National Woodwork ruling as allowing unions to enforce prefabrication clauses not only for purpose of preserving present jobsite tasks but also to reacquire work previously performed but not wholly lost.

Court Sustains NLRB On Penalty Clause: Ninth Circuit rules that Bricklayers in Washington State acted unlawfully by insisting "to impasse" on contract clause requiring employers who violate subcontracting agreement to pay to union sum of money equivalent to union dues and initiation fees lost as result. Court agrees with NLRB that provision, like clauses relating to performance bonds, is nonmandatory subject of bargaining and that union engaged in bad-faith bargaining in pushing demand to point of contract deadlock.

Dual Role of Foremen Splits Labor Board: Wrestling with issue of applying Section 8(a)(2) of Act to special conditions of construction industry, NLRB holds by three to two vote that New Jersey contractors did not unlawfully interfere in internal affairs of Electricians union by employing as foremen seven individuals who at same time served as union officers. In dismissing complaint, majority agrees with trial examiner that employers had little knowledge of official union positions of foremen and made no attempt to influence or dominate union activities through them. Dissent of McCulloch and Brown sees impermissible conflict of interest in dual role of foremen that goes beyond normal "overlapping of allegiance" found in construction industry because union posts held by supervisors were key ones.

NLRB Sustained On Boycott Finding: Court of Appeals for District of Columbia affirms decision of NLRB that Glaziers in Kansas City ran afoul of secondary boycott ban by picketing and causing work stoppages during its protest over alleged violation of area standards by manufacturer whose preglazed windows were being installed at jobsite. Court rejects union contentions that Board had made "crucial error" in its findings of fact and that picketing was informational in character and protected by Supreme Court's decision in Tree Fruits case.

Handbilling at Secondary Sites Called Lawful: NLRB rules that Sheet Metal Workers in Houston had right, under consumer publicity proviso, to publicize its grievance against contractor by handbilling downtown stores of retailers who were doing business with contractor at suburban shopping center under construction. Proviso has no geographical limitation restricting handbilling to site of shopping center where contractor was performing services for retailers.

Employer Race Bias May Be Unfair Labor Practice: Circuit court in District of Columbia declares that Title VII of Civil Rights Act does not preclude NLRB from determining that employer discrimination against workers based on race or national origin restrains rights of employees to engage in concerted activity in violation of Section 8(a)(1) of Taft-Hartley Act. Board has jurisdiction to examine racial policies of employers as well as unions for possible unfair labor practices, court says. It directs Board to take further evidence on whether West Texas employer practices discrimination and, if so, to issue "appropriate remedy."

NOTES ON ECONOMICS, EFFICIENCY AND INFLATION

Congress Probes Waste Of Seasonality: House subcommittee opens examination of seasonality problem in construction and possible cures, with all witnesses agreeing that economic cost to employers, building tradesmen, government, and public stemming from periodic shutdown of industry is enormous and often needless. Consensus is that government should show way in breaking habitual seasonal patterns and private construction will follow.

Selected Controls Suggested To Curb Inflation: Attorney William J. Curtin declares that if government persuasion is unable to keep wages and prices in check, only viable alternative may be "selected mandatory controls" on problem segments of economy. And, in Curtin's opinion, construction industry well might be first target unless employers and unions "earmark wage and price restraint as their prime objective during the coming months and into next year."

Tradesmen Underutilized, Report Says: Study commissioned by President's Committee on Urban Housing says improved utilization of existing construction work force is key to meeting nation's need for more low and middle-income housing during coming decade. It presently takes more than five million persons to fill yearly average of 3.2 million construction jobs, report says.

Congress Votes Seasonality Study: House and Senate pass bills calling for government inquiry into construction seasonality and methods of stabilizing employment patterns. Senate provision differs in that it calls for study to be jointly conducted by Labor and Commerce Departments, not Labor alone. Special report prepared by Labor Secretary Wirtz and former Commerce Secretary Trowbridge urges issuance of executive order relating to easing of seasonality through improved federal contracting policies.

Seasonality Study Cleared By Congress: Congress completes action and sends to White House legislation directing government study of methods of easing employment seasonality in construction as House agrees to Senate amendment calling for joint inquiry by Labor and Commerce Departments. Deadline for submission of study's findings and recommendations is December 31, 1969.

CEA Member Sees Efficiency Lag In Construction: Merton J. Peck, member of President's Council of Economic Advisers, says construction industry must discard "structural" bars to greater productivity if economy is to maintain high employment without inflation. Cabinet Committee on Price Stability, in its study of ways to open efficiency "bottlenecks," is looking into such matters as manpower problems, seasonality, and technological progress, Peck tells Building Products Executive Conference. Suppliers also hear from William J. McSorley, assistant to president of AFL-CIO Building Trades Department, and Fred W. Mast, president of Associated General Contractors of America.

Conference Focuses On Seasonality Problem: Participants in two-day AGC Conference on seasonality agree that practical problems involved in stabilizing employment on year-round basis are such that only united efforts by government and all elements of industry will bring real progress. Speakers see no prospect that lengthened workyear will lead to wage "rollbacks" but express belief that more stable pattern of employment should ease rate escalation pressures. Senator Prouty of Vermont, author of recently-enacted seasonality study bill, says government inquiry should lay factual foundation for overcoming seasonality.

White House Moves On Seasonality Problem: Declaring that reduction in construction seasonality would serve "nation's goals of high employment and price stability," President Johnson issues long-awaited directive to federal agencies to program their projects to promote off-season work and stabilize employment patterns. Agencies are to submit reports by next July 1 on what they have done to comply, along with recommendations for additional measures to minimize seasonality impact. AFL-CIO President Meany hails President's directive, says government now has "sound program" to help end waste of manpower. Building Trades Department calls President's action "a meaningful and satisfying development".

Construction Rise of 7 Percent Foreseen: While failing to match pace of expansion this year, dollar volume of new construction in 1969 will advance by more than $6 billion to totalof $91 billion, Commerce Department estimates. This would represent seven percent gain, compared to upsurge of 10 percent between 1967 and 1968. Government report sees probability of continued cost escalation due to sizable 1968 increases in wages and prices of materials, but hopes tighter fiscal policies will help ease inflationary pressures.

New Guidelines Offered To Restore Price Stability: Reporting to President, Cabinet Committee on Price Stability says interest of nation requires that labor and management exercise voluntary restraint and cooperate with government in braking spiral of inflation. "The trend of 1968 must be reversed in 1969," committee says in calling for "deceleration" in wage and price increases to maintain full employment without runaway prices. Wage increases, in committee's opinion, should run just under 5 percent, and management should absorb increases of 1 percent in unit costs and hold profit margins to 1967-68 average. Construction industry is labeled one of the "persistent sources of inflation." Report's recommendations for easing inflationary pressures include measures to remove structural "bottlenecks" in construction industry's supply of skilled manpower, materials, and capital through such means as improved technology, better training programs, deseasonalization, and increased reciprocity, vesting, and coverage of pension and welfare funds.

Nixon Pledges "New Approaches" To Inflation: His Administration will have "some new approaches" toward controlling inflation without materially increasing unemployment, President Nixon says. He discounts effectiveness of exhorting labor and management to follow wage-price guidelines, says prime responsibility for controlling inflation rests with national government through "fine tuning" of fiscal and monetary policy. Cabinet Committee on Economic Policy is established.

Prices Nearly 5 Percent Higher Than Year Ago: Bureau of Labor Statistics reports Consumer Price Index rose to 123.7 percent of 1957-59 base in December. Gain from December 1967 is 4.7 percent, greatest annual increase since 1951. Wholesale prices also are up and sharp rise is expected this month. CPI standings for major cities.

COST OF LIVING

CIP GOES UP AGAIN, ADVANCE OVER YEAR GREATEST SINCE 1951

The Consumer Price Index rose again in December, advancing by 0.2 percent to 123.7 percent of the 1957-59 base. Since December 1967 the index has gone up 4.7 percent, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics notes that the average gain over the year is the sharpest annual increase since 1951.

Most of the December increase was due to higher food and housing costs, and higher charges for public transportation and medical care services, BLS says. There were significant price cuts for new and used cars.

The Wholesale Price Index also rose 0.2 percent in December, to 109.8 percent of the 1957-59 base period, and a much greater advance in wholesale prices -- about 0.8 percent -- is expected in January. The Wholesale Price Index went up 2.8 percent during 1968.

About 88,000 workers will receive cost-of-living wage adjustments based on the CPI for December, according to BLS. The largest group -- some 54,000 in the glass container industry -- will get a 1 percent increase in an annual review.

CPI standings for major cities follow:

NOTES ON COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AND PROBLEMS

Average Of Wage Increases Up By 5 Cents: BNA survey of construction settlements negotiated in first half of 1968 shows that median wage increases provided in first year of contracts was 38.3 cents per hour, up 5.4 cents over first half of 1967 and about twice the average of two years ago. All-industry median in first six months of 1968 was 16.4 cents hourly, representing boost of 2.7 cents. Size of bargained settlements in construction continues to lead all industries by substantial margin.

Management Moves Toward National Unity: On initiative of AGC, eight national contractor associations agree to formation of Council of Construction Employers to meet quarterly to thrash out unified stand on labor and other common problems. Group will be composed of president and senior executive officer of each affiliated organization, and actions must be unanimous to carry sanction of Council.

Construction Study Team Formed By NAM: National Association of Manufacturers reports that J. Warren Shaver, U.S. Steel executive, will chair study group on labor problems in construction, make recommendations on possible action by NAM.

AGC Calls For Action By Government: At mid-year meeting of Board of Directors, Associated General Contractors of America urges next Congress and Administration to initiate "positive program" to combat cost inflation and other ills hindering "healthy expansion of our economy." Subcommittees instructed to finalize program of strike insurance and to study problems which AGC chapters and members have "with respect to national and project agreements".

Another convention speaker, G.R. Collins, NCA president, warns that industry faces possibility of government controls, loss of historic markets, and replacement of present bargaining structure unless it overcomes twin problems of spiralling wage rates and jurisdictional work stoppages. But C.J. Haggerty, building trades chief, says unions have become "scapegoat" for nation's economic ills and that wage settlements are no more than keeping pace with rises in living costs. Lyons declares union will firmly oppose any restructuring of bargaining that puts labor at disadvantage.

Humphrey Unveils Wage-Price Plan: Declaring that restoration of price stability is essential, Task Force on Inflation appointed by Vice President issues report calling for labor and management collaboration in formulating principles to keep wage and price increases under control while maintaining high employment. New stabilization policy should take into account more than just productivity trends underlying old guideposts, report states.

Chamber Calls Conclave On Construction Costs: Business leaders, contractors, and government officials are invited by Chamber of Commerce of the United States to national conference in Washington, D.C., November 18-19, to consider causes of and seek solutions to "inflationary costs facing the building industry and the nation's economy".

Average Wage Increase Continues To Climb: Median first-year wage increase in construction contracts bargained during first nine months of year continued to outpace gains in other industries, advancing to 49.6 cents per hour, according to BNA quarterly survey. Median was 14.9 cents above figure for comparable 1967 period and two and one-half times average posted in first three quarters of 1966. All-industry median rose by four cents, to 18.2 cents hourly, in January-September 1968, and gain of 25 cents posted in shipping & longshoring was highest industry median next to construction's 49.6 cents.

ABC Convention Outlines Labor Aims: At 11th annual convention, Associated Builders & Contractors recommends that Congress enact statute placing antitrust restraints on unions to counter their "monopoly status," and urges repeal of federal laws "detrimental to free enterprise construction industry" -- including Davis-Bacon Act and Taft-Hartley proviso permitting agreements restricting subcontracting of job-site work.

Garvin Seeks Support Of Construction Customers: Consultant John C. Garvin enlarges his campaign for restructuring collective bargaining in construction industry with appeal for backing of industrial owners, private power companies, banks, and insurance companies. Garvin tells Houston, Tex., meeting of industrial owners and contractors "it is not an exaggeration to say that wages in this industry are completely out of control."

Average Union Scale Hits $5.17 In Third Quarter: Average hourly wage of union building tradesmen rose 6.7 percent, or 32.1 cents, between October 1, 1967 and October 1, 1968, according to Bureau of Labor Statistics' quarterly survey of key trades in 100 cities. Over-the-year gain in wages and fringes combined is estimated at 8.3 percent, or 43.3 cents an hour. Average base rates range from $3.97 for Building Laborers to $5.77 for Plumbers.

Employers' failure to meet responsibilities is blamed for some of industry's problems. J.M. Graney says management "must interest itself in the functioning and operation of the machinery for assigning and referring men to jobs" and "take an active role in establishing craft jurisdiction and developing codifications of jobs in line with the realities of modern industrial construction techniques." Wharton School Professor Herbert Northrup attributes state of affairs to "managerial failure and abdiction, as well as inherent union power." Northrup also warns against regional bargaining.

Conference Calls For Action To Curb Construction Costs: Participants in two-day conference sponsored by United States Chamber of Commerce authorize formation of task force to blueprint programs at one to combat "spiraling inflation and to preserve the free collective bargaining process" in construction industry. Speakers paint grim picture of present state of affairs, calling it chaotic at best, and emphasize importance of enlisting support of construction clients. Better coordination among employers bargaining groups and "consideration of establishing new bargaining groups" is endorsed. Effect of national agreements on local negotiations is debated vigorously.

Two Leaders Of Employer Task Force Named: Wayne T. Brooks, industrial relations director of American Iron & Steel Institute, becomes chairman of industry task force charged with blueprinting action programs designed to overcome labor problems. Vice chairman is John Post of Golightly & Company International, Houston, Tex.

Minimum Intervention Is Shultz' Credo: Outlining his philosophy in general terms, George P. Shultz, who will be President-elect Nixon's Secretary of Labor, indicates he will not assume an activist role. He believes parties under free bargaining system should work out problems on their own with minimum of Labor Department mediation and intervention in strike situations. He expresses no enthusiasm about reviving wage-price guideposts, noting that he has been skeptical in the past about their utility.

NOTES ON AFFIRMATIVE ACTION AND DISCRIMINATION

Minority Successes Reported By Slaiman: Entry of minority group workers into building trades in past three years has shown "tremendous increase" because of Apprenticeship Outreach programs, according to AFL-CIO civil rights director, Donald Slaiman. But he adds that apprenticeships alone cannot solve problem of severe unemployment in nation's ghettos since relatively few jobs are involved.

Anti-Bias Pledge Sought From State Road Agencies: Nine-point "statement of assurance" of intent to comply with equal opportunity provisions of the Federal Aid Highway Act of 1968 has been submitted to each state highway department for endorsement by Federal Highway Administrator Lowell K. Bridwell. Statement requires each state to create and enforce equal opportunity program by "affirmative action." Under law, no pledge means no money.

Cincinnati Electricians Hit For Title VII Breach: Federal district court in Ohio upholds complaints that Electricians in Cincinnati engaged in pattern or practice of discrimination against Negroes in membership and job referrals, violating Title VII of Civil Rights Act. Court directs Local 212 to suspend existing job refferal system and "hammer out" temporary one basing referrals on objective standards of employment qualification. Judge rejects position of U.S. Attorney General that union is required to take "affirmative action" to correct effects of discrimination that took place prior to effective date of Title VII, saying only step law mandates is posting of notices as to its provisions.

Prepare For Bias Charges, Lyons Tells Locals: General President John H. Lyons of Iron Workers says social unrest and general public belief that building trades discriminate is likely to increase number of bias charges against construction locals in future and that best protection against suits is adoption of procedures assuring that no discrimination exists, plus careful maintenance of records to prove it. He says at union convention that international's investigations have turned up no instance of racial bias on part of Iron Workers' apprenticeship committees.

Prequalifying Order Issues For Highway Work: Federal Highway Administration issues interim order, effective December 1, outlining policies and procedures for prequalifying contractors relative to their equal opportunity obligations under Federal-Aid Highway Act of 1968. Covering contracts of $500,000 or more, order requires prospective bidders to undertake affirmative action programs in accordance with established guidelines "to the end that any and all discrimination in employment...shall be eliminated".

Pittsburgh Imposes Affirmative Action: Effective November 1, contractors bidding for jobs advertised by City of Pittsburgh must draw up affirmative action programs assuring "there will be minority group representation in all trades and in all phases of their operations." Sanctions against equal-opportunity violators would include contract cancellation, damage payments, or debarment.

Outreach Projects Expand To 51 Cities: With addition of five approved projects, Apprenticeship Outreach programs to prepare minority group youths for entry into building trades now are operating in 51 major industrial areas throughout country. Labor Department reports that so far 1,700 youths tutored for apprentice tests have been accepted as construction apprentices and another 1,000 trainees will be prepared for examinations in immediate months ahead.

EEOC Changes Reconsideration Rule: To speed processing of Title VII cases, Equal Employment Opportunity Commission revises its policy regarding reconsideration of its determinations as to whether or not there is reasonable cause to believe that a discrimination charge is true. It will no longer entertain reconsideration requests from parties involved in charges but retains right to take second look on its own motion.

EEOC Amends Procedural Regulations: Equal Employment Opportunity Commission revises its regulations under Title VII of Civil Rights Act with respect to filing procedures for discrimination cases arising in areas where state or local agencies have first crack at resolving disputes. Stated objective is to minimize confusion.

Government To Encourage Non-White Contractors: Small Business Administration announces nation-wide program intended to increase number of non-white construction contractors by 70,000 during next decade. Project will focus initially on 18 target cities, where local "action teams" will be complemented by efforts of national task force headed by SBA Administrator Howard J. Samuels, who says construction industry is "fertile field" for minority business expansion.

Need For Affirmative Action Guidelines Restressed: Comptroller General reaffirms stand that government should set forth definite standards enabling contractors to know in advance what is expected of them when it requires bidders to submit approved affirmative action programs prior to award of construction contracts governed by Executive Order 11246. CG's opinion comes in response to complaint about operation of equal opportunity pre-award plan in Philadelphia.

Outreach Project Continued In Detroit: Labor Department extends for additional year Apprenticeship Outreach project sponsored by Trade Union Leadership Council in Detroit. Prior contract was successful in placing 91 minority group youths in apprenticeship training programs of building trades, and new contract aims at expanding entries by 80.

Reynolds Details Open-Door Progress: Under Secretary of Labor reviews role of Labor Department in increasing minority group employment in construction, says "real beginning towards true equality of opportunity has been made" in last couple of years. Today, in contrast to situation in recent past, minorities are being informed of opportunities and applying for openings, and building trades are actively helping to get them in, he says.

Contract Compliance Labeled As Failure: Witnesses before ad hoc congressional committee maintain that on basis of record to date program to force employers doing business with government to practice equal employment opportunity has been virtual washout, primarily because of lax enforcement of Executive Order 11246 and misplaced reliance on "voluntary" contract compliance. Bulk of criticism is directed at Labor Department's Office of Federal Contract Compliance for not having used its power to cancel contracts, thus nullifying what was termed government's prime weapon to secure meaningful compliance. Witnesses, including spokesmen for the U.S. Civil Rights Commission and NAACP, recommend severance of OFCC from Labor Department. Ad hoc committee will present report to incoming Nixon Administration on strengthening enforcement procedures.

State Agency In Ohio Charged With Bias: In first civil rights suit of its kind, Justice Department charges that Ohio Bureau of Employment Services discriminates against Negroes in its job placement operations. Among allegations in complaint are that Bureau refuses to refer qualified Negroes to apprentice programs on same basis as white applicants and that it services apprentice programs which it "knows or has reason to believe discriminate on the basis of race or color in their own practices".

Senate Inquiry Set On Prequalifying Order: Chairman Randolph (D., W.Va.) of Senate Public Works Committee schedules mid-January hearings to take testimony on "numerous complaints" that Federal Highway Administration has gone beyond law in issuance of order requiring prequalification of federal-aid highway contractors relative to their equal opportunity obligations. Industry witnesses will have their day on January 14, followed by government spokesmen on January 16.

Minority Training Pact Signed In Pennsylvania: Pennsylvania State Council of Operating Engineers contracts with Labor Department under Manpower Development & Training Act to give 100 out-of-work minority youths 26 weeks of classroom instruction and experience with equipment. Training will take place at Boy Scout reservation and those who complete course of instruction will be dispatched to jobs.

Outreach Contract Renewed In Oklahoma: Labor Department approves another one-year contract with Southwestern Oklahoma Building Trades Council to recruit and prepare minority group youths to pass apprentice-entry tests. Under initial contract 70 youths were placed in formal apprenticeship programs, exceeding goal of 40, and 10 others who passed tests await placement. Nationally, more than 2,000 minority youths have become indentured apprentices through Outreach programs in past two years, Labor Department reports.

Hard-Core Training Pact Made In Kansas City: Builders' Association of Kansas City, Mo., and Labor Department execute two-year JOBS contract, with concurrence of unions, to hire and train 360 hard-core unemployed in six construction trades. Close to $1.5 million in federal funds is being allocated to program, which will include remedial education and other special support services.

Asbestos Workers Lose Appeal In Race Bias Case: Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals sees no reason to disturb temporary injunction issed by lower court to prevent discrimination against Negroes and Mexican-Americans in membership and job referrals by Local 53 of Asbestos Workers in southeastern Louisiana. Affirming injunctive order, court rejects contention that decree is unduly punitive, says lower court acted within its allowable discretion in fashioning remedy directing local to take number of affirmative action steps to erase present effects of past discrimination and to prevent future discrimination.

Union States Support of Nonbias Order: President Russel Berg of Boilermakers sends letter to contractors reaffirming union's "intentions to comply with and support" Executive Order 11246 relating to equal employment opportunity on federally financed and assisted projects.

Outreach Projects Begin In Two More Cities: Labor Department signs one-year contracts with Urban League in Omaha and Fort Worth Building Trades Council to prepare 80 minority youths for entry into construction trades through apprenticeships. This brings number of so-called Outreach programs operating throughout country to 53. Program in Denver is renewed for another year after exceeding its placement goal under initial contract.

NOTES ON APPRENTICESHIP AND TRAINING

Unions Given Policy Guide On Model Cities: AFL-CIO Building Trades Department releases statement of policy containing guidelines for affiliated locals throughout country in bargaining of agreements covering employment and training of ghetto residents on urban rehabilitation projects under Model Cities Act. Recruited residents would be grouped and paid according to their work experience, with the unskilled receiving special pre-job instruction.

More Prisoners To Get Craft Training: Labor Department says additional correctional institutions may establish apprentice training programs, patterned after pilot project at McNeil Island Penitentiary in Washington, which are administered by labor-management committees.

2,000 Hard-Core Jobless Due For Training: Labor Department reports that nearly 2,000 of nation's hard-core unemployed will receive on-the-job training in building trades skills through 31 contracts signed so far this year under President's new JOBS program. About $6.4 million in federal funds has been earmarked for training in 20 cities.

Negro Apprentices Record Sharp Rise: Number of Negroes participating in registered apprenticeship programs jumped from 4,200 at end of 1966 to 8,100 as of mid-1968, Labor Department estimates. Wirtz attributes improvement to Outreach programs and "deliberate efforts" of labor-management committees to meet equal opportunity pledges.

Community Participation Agreed To In Boston: Some 200 residents of area to be rehabilitated in Boston will receive construction work and training opportunities under multi-faceted program worked out by unions, contractors, government, and other groups to meet community participation requirement of Model Cities Act. On-job and supplemental training costs will be covered by Labor Department contract providing $238,208.

Apprentice Entry Standards Waived In Newark: Painters District Council 10 and New Jersey Civil Service Department work out program under which no educational requirements or written tests will be applied to Spanish-speaking youths seeking to become painter apprentices employed by city of Newark, where there is shortage of journeymen and large reservoir of minority manpower. Screening of such apprenticeship applicants will be limited to physical performance test.

Rehabilitation Project Agreement Made In St. Louis: Construction management and building trades in St. Louis join with government, AFL-CIO, and community group in formulating program to train and employ area residents in course of rehabilitating 300 housing units over two-year period in Negro neighborhood, with work being done under direction of Negro general contractor. Project labor agreement divides recruited neighborhood residents into three classifications and provides that trainees and advanced trainees will be employed at ratio of at least one for every three skilled journeymen. Endorsed by five contractor associations and 14 unions, pact is expected to set pattern for later agreements of broader scope covering urban reconstruction financed under Model Cities Act.

Apprenticeship Held Unaffected By Age Bias Act: Age limitations for entry into bona fide apprenticeship programs were not intended to be affected by Age Discrimination in Employment Act, Labor Department's Wage and Hour and Public Contracts Division rules.

Dear Emory:

On behalf of the Institute for Labor Studies I extend our appreciation for your appearance and participation in the West Virginia Building Trades Conference. Your presentation was useful, appreciative and timely. In addition it was interesting and well presented.

As I indicated in an earlier memo we are processing the proper number of papers in an effort to extend to you an honorarium of $200 in lieu of expenses. This processing does occasionally take time. Please be patient.

In addition it was personally good to meet with you and to have had the opportunity to exchange gossip. Since then some things have changed a bit. For example, it appears that Dick has now decided against going to D.C.

Best wishes.

Fraternally,

INTRODUCTION

The Southern Regional Council and the American Jewish Committee originally asked Reese Cleghorn, associate editor of the Atlanta Journal, to undertake this comprehensive overview of right-wing extremism in the South before the recent efforts to use this sentiment as a base for a nationwide political movement. Our purpose was to cast fresh light on the frustrations and tensions—some local and others quite unrelated to geographic area—that contribute to racism and bigotry in this country.

Although the final Wallace vote in the 1968 Presidential election was far smaller than early opinion polls had indicated, it demonstrated quite clearly that a sizable reservoir of prejudice and repression continues to exist in our land, and that it is vulnerable to manipulation by politically ambitious demagogues, not only in the South, but in the large industrial centers of the North as well.

Mr. Cleghorn's incisive examination into the roots of the "Wallace phenomenon" reveals the historical and psychological underpinnings of southern extremism and alienation and its implications for the nation as a whole. Such an understanding, in our judgment, is an essential element in any program designed to strengthen the forces of moderation and justice not only in the South, but throughout the length and breadth of our nation.

Paul Anthony

Bertram H. Gold
Executive Vice-President
The American Jewish Committee

John F. Kennedy had chosen the South as a forum for dealing with the most serious import of rightwing extremism. In the speech that was not delivered in Dallas on November 22, 1963, the President was to have said:

"Ignorance and misinformation can handicap the progress of a city or a company—but they can, if allowed to prevail in foreign policy, handicap this country's security. In a world of complex and continuing problems, in a world full of frustrations and irritations, America's leadership must be guided by the lights of learning and reason—or else those who confuse rhetoric with reality and the plausible with the possible will gain the popular ascendancy with their seemingly swift and simple solutions to every world problem.

"There will always be dissident voices heard in the land. . . . Those voices are inevitable. But today other voices are heard in the land—voices preaching doctrines wholly unrelated to reality . . . We cannot expect that everyone, to use the phrase of a decade ago, will 'talk sense to the American people.' But we can hope that fewer people will listen to nonsense. . . ."

Less than three months later, Professor Revilo P. Oliver, a member of the John Birch Society's National Council, expressed his view in the society's magazine, American Opinion, that "Kennedy was assassinated by the Communist Conspiracy because he was planning to turn American." Robert Welch, founder and president of the Birch Society, found Professor Oliver's analysis to be "superb commentary." Such is the degree of irrationalism which characterizes the extreme right in America and which, as President Kennedy had suggested, can endanger American security "in a world full of frustrations and irritations."

In the South today, as in turbulent and unsettled California and in the old isolationist regions of the Middle West, what we might call "white-collar" rightwing extremism has found fertile ground. To designate it "rightwing" is, however, a poor bit of shorthand, for, as President Kennedy seemed to be saying, its doctrines and underlying assumptions often are in essence neither left nor right but simply hallucinations, "wholly unrelated to reality." By some measures these "rightwing extremists" are close to the most extreme left, having strong anarchistic leanings and, contradictorily, strong inclinations toward state suppression and totalitarianism. Rightist radicalism arises generally out of the great confusion which rapid change has produced in American life. More specifically, it comes out of an inability on the part of millions of 20th Century Americans to understand an increasingly complex form of government; and an inability, for all the extreme right's ostensible devotion to tradition, to accept perhaps the most important tradition underlying two centuries of democratic continuity in America: moderation and liberality in our political processes and a rejection of political diabolism.

The seed sown in the South by the Birch Society and lesser organizations of the extreme right fall on soil different from that of California or Michigan. It is fertile soil for rightwing doctrines; yet it could prove less receptive to hard-line rightwing organizations than the political and social climate might at first suggest.

It is well to remember that most of the nation only recently made a gross misjudgment in the case of racism, finding the South peculiarly guilty on the basis of the usual indicators. Then in the 1960s we began to see slack-jawed hoodlums harassing peacefully demonstrating Negroes in Michigan, Wisconsin and California. (Were these the fabled "crackers"?) We also heard mayors and congressmen from New Jersey and Illinois speaking all the lines long since assumed to be the peculiar litany of southern officialdom. (Were these "Dixiecrats"?) Perhaps all this has changed some of our perception of racism outside the South; surely it also must have changed some of the simplistic views about the South itself. An examination of rightwing radicalism in the South will be similarly distorted if runaway assumptions allow us to take specifics of rightwing influence in the region and loosely extend them to generalities with the reasoning that all this must be so because the South is, after all, "the most rightwing part of the country."

THE SOUTH'S PECULIAR ETHOS

The South does have its peculiar ethos, of course, that repeatedly has entangled it with whatever rightwing obsession was current. This, along with the more Gothic part of the South's history, has generated judgments that often are too pat. Consider, for example, the ways in which the region can easily be compared with the rightist totalitarian countries of our time.

This is the only part of the country with a history of strong "master race" theory. It has often been regionally paranoiac, suspicious of the rest of the nation and of the world. It is the only part of the country that has suffered stinging and humiliating defeat, and that in a war with a central moral issue. It has always been the poorest part of the nation, and often it has been the victim of discrimination; for instance, for generations, through railroad freight-rate structures fashioned through Northern political and industrial influence to help enable Northern industry to make a colony of the South. Its peculiar Church, warped by its proximity first to slavery and later to white supremacy, developed apart from mainstream Christianity and came to a theology that rationalized the status quo and sanctified the authority of the state — the state government — in basic social matters. Finally, it is the part of the country most conscious of a martial heritage. It has always responded to war. Even in the wake of the Civil War calamity and estrangement from the nation, the South was in the forefront of American chauvinism in the Spanish-American War. Much of its private, secondary education has been in military academies. A general in uniform, Robert E. Lee, adorns the walls of its banks, law firms, and insurance offices. It has been the region lending greatest support to a "hard line" on Vietnam. Without question, the South thrills to military braid and admires military authority.

For comparison, place alongside these characteristics, now, some characteristics of places which in the 20th Century have been the most fertile ground for rightwing extremism. More often than not, they have been places with a tradition of or a susceptibility to racial doctrines something like white supremacy; have known chaos, defeat and/or some colonization (not necessarily through political structures) on the part of other countries; have had deep-running problems of poverty; have had religious influences that identified themselves with narrow power interests and with the state; and could readily accept military authority and the enthronement of military swagger and its trappings as a kind of substitute for or handmaiden of monarchy's regal trappings.

The comparisons may be imperfect, but they have general validity. If the South had attained its independence a century ago, it might have moved further into these patterns under the duress of hardship. The social, economic, political, and religious conditions that bred demagogues who could only flail against Washington might have made demagogues who could have captured the Capitol at Richmond. The modern technology without which real totalitarianism is impossible might have abetted the suppression of dissent. (The process of suppression often has been present in the South; the means usually have not been.) The hardy, indigenous strain of liberality and resistance which always has been present in the South might have been overcome, just as similar old, indigenous democratic strains were overcome in Germany Italy, Spain, Portugal and many other countries.

But because the South was not a separate nation, because it had to make its public life mesh at least somewhat with that of the nation and ultimately abide by the Constitution, the influences that might have tilted it this other way remained strong but not dominant. The region was protected and saved by its own defeat. The relatively honorable leadership of the Confederacy, which (notwithstanding its defense of slavery) still had much of the idealism and the republican, democratic devotion of the nation's Founding Fathers, was not supplanted by political jackals of the kind that often come in the second and third stages of revolution.

Liberals of the South usually have instinctively known all this, or at least have acted on these premises: They have known that the survival of liberal democracy in the South sometimes has been dependent upon supplies, spiritual reinforcement and governmental force from outside, all these constituting a kind of reverse "underground railroad." For all their prominence, the worst influences in the region could never fully move it into anti-democratic, anti-liberal patterns. All this was with one mighty exception, of course: Negroes in much of the South lived under totalitarian control. But in a strange contradiction, even while this was taking place democracy was being extended and was becoming entrenched for others in the South.

The region's very racism enabled it to put Negroes aside as another variety of beings, so that they were not even seen as contradictions to the South's oft-expressed and oft-serious devotion to democracy. In the South's view Negroes were, after all, different. Even during the aberrations of the 1950s and early 1960s in Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama and Georgia, state-level efforts at totalitarianism were only outrageous, not finally effective. The Mississippi State Sovereignty Commission said blithely that thought control was one of its chief objectives; but it never did, even so, control thoughts. Even in Mississippi's sickness of the time, this could not have been pulled off. Some sense of democracy prevailed when white people's rights began to be intruded upon.

The South in its worst moments, as during the throes of reaction following the 1954 Supreme Court desegregation decision, has been saved from its home-grown totalitarians by two forces: the centuries-old grassroots sense of democracy (which, though blinded to the lack of democracy for Negroes, was very real); and the South's very romanticism and irrationalism. Irrationalism, then, has worked both ways: to nurture doctrines of the radical right, and to thwart them in application. A police state, surely, must have efficiency and a basic ideology compatible with the aims of state control.

IRRATIONALISM: A WAY OF LIFE

Irrationalism has been a public way of life in the South since early in the 19th Century, when the region had to begin reconciling its devotion to democracy with its denial of democracy to Negroes. The South thus is vulnerable, by tradition, to nonsense. With the necessity of embracing American ideals while simultaneously defending first slavery and later rigid white supremacy, which often was absurd as well as ruthless in practice, the white South developed an irrational thought system that was both legalistic and moralistic. Its objectives, of course, were neither legal nor moral. Given this tension, the most preposterous propositions came to be accepted with tenacity. Leslie W. Dunbar has written of a great wonder: the fact that the South, which bore a burden of regional guilt that was apparent to anyone who looked and had some sensitivity to morality, has always regarded itself not just as a moral equal among regions but as morally superior. To manage this, and to manage to defy the Constitution and make the rest of the nation ignore that for a century, it was necessary to invent legalistic and moralistic rationales that could and did stand the test of time. They were codified, becoming a catechism which ignorant white southerners could ignore ("nigger, nigger" being sufficient for them) but which intelligent and educated white southerners must know and defend lest they be seduced by troublesome alien beliefs, sponsored by "outsiders" who "hated the South." Consequently, irrational mechanisms — "Our Negroes are happy and don't want any of this agitation," "The 14th Amendment is really illegal," "The Supreme Court's decisions are unconstitutional," "The South is not racist; it is just for states rights and freedom of association"—became perfectly acceptable. The mind that could not understand these things, so the thinking went, just did not understand the South.

It is an easy jump from these mental processes, which were the product of guilt, obsessive defensiveness, closed-mindedness, and a bit of paranoia, to the catechisms of those who "confuse rhetoric with reality and the plausible with the possible." These codes, too, usually are based upon obsessive defensiveness, guilt, closed-mindedness and a bit of paranoia. People who could believe that every day a snickering, South-hating, usurping, power-mad, socialistic ilk in Washington was plotting to throttle the South's best interests and set Negroes on their best friends might just as well believe that every day Moscow was chortling as it watched its agents infiltrate and gain control of the government, press, churches and unions of America so that the country was already about three-fourths conquered by Soviet power. The two propositions were, after all, about equally true. And, of course, when the Communist scare was nicely linked with the Negro scare, as an explanation of why "our Negroes are upset," the second proposition tended to make still more sense.

CHANGE AND PERSONAL CRISIS

Then there are the crises of change in the South which are a part of the change going on elsewhere in the country. Especially intensive are the changes from rural to urban and from agricultural to industrial. Uncertainty about one's place and worth appears to be an increasing phenomenon in the highly organized society of modern America. It also appears to be a common factor among many people attracted to rightwing extremism. A number of analyses have suggested this. Using conclusions of a study of radical rightists, Ira S. Rohter, a political scientist at the University of Wisconsin, has usefully categorized many rightists as "the decliners, the new arrivals, and the value keepers" who feel status frustration. The "decliners" are people "going down on the social scale—undeservedly, as they see it," often falling below the status levels of fathers who were self-employed businessmen or farm owners; the "new arrivals" are "on the way up" but caught in the lag between the time the new arrival achieves success and the time he finds an established place among peers and is accepted as an equal; the "value keepers" may be rising or falling in status and feel themselves at least temporarily threatened severely by "aliens who know not the Lord," who put more stock in education, expertise and mass solutions than in the hard work, self-discipline, prudence and independence that was the bedrock of the small-town life of the past.

Study of a selected group of radical rightists indicated, Rohter concluded, a disproportionate number who were undergoing status change with feelings that they "do not have the prestige and power they should have if the world were just—and their enemies have too much." They identify themselves with "older, traditional (Protestant ethic) values of work, religion and morality" so that their fight seems not simply a struggle with other legitimate interests but, rather, on the side of truth, justice, decency, God and America. They tend to believe their troubles are caused by an evil conspiracy and see society as essentially closed to them, dominated by personalities, controlled by the wrong kind of people. They want simple explanations, and conspiracy satisfies that need. They tend to show "strident negativism and combativeness" that expresses itself in extreme self-righteousness, a strong belief in harsh punishments, a feeling of powerlessness, a view that Communism is not merely a bad and aggressive threat but an all-pervasive Satan incarnate which cannot be tolerated in any way by the righteous. (About half were members of fundamentalist religious faiths.)

It is obvious that much of the South is susceptible to such feelings, with the South's unusually rapid increase in population mobility and transitions of many kinds. Between 1950 and 1960 the nation's increase in urban population was 29.3 per cent, and in the South as defined by the Census it was 40.1 per cent. The rural farm population declined 41.7 per cent nationally and 50.2 per cent in the South. During that decade the South's urban population increased from 48.6 per cent to 58.5 per cent of the total population (compared with a national figure of 69.9 per cent). Even such a Deep South state as Georgia, which had been 90 per cent rural at the turn of the century, plunged well beyond the 50-50 mark in urbanization.

Values of the farm and the village often are in sharp conflict with the demands of the city. Further, religious fundamentalism has been so widespread in the South in the past that a confused southerner seeking explanations for the strange changes in the world around him may respond well to a simplistic religious explanation. Rightwing extremism also is more likely to be race-related in the South than elsewhere. This is true not only because of historic racist doctrines in the region but also because a man who feels his own status threatened can see that in recent years Negroes have been rising on the ladder, Jews have occupied prominent places, and a Catholic has become President. Much of the nation may be startled at the very idea when it sees hoodlums bearing signs saying "White Power," "Keep America White," and "National Association for the Advancement of White Power," but the idea of Anglo-Saxon whites' being shoved aside and outdistanced is not strange to men and women whose own individual status seems imperiled and who are surrounded by others who see things the same way. In terms of numbers of people, there may be more of this feeling in the urban, industrial areas of the Midwest and the mobile, often impersonal and frequently rootless life of California. But in the South of today, probably a higher percentage of the population feels this powerlessness and victimization.

THE POLITICAL RADICALS

It is in the political arena, rather than in the spread of such organizations as the John Birch Society, that these frustrations are having the most dramatic impact in the South. The region obviously has much more than its proportionate share of major political figures who are close to the radical right. The list is long, but these examples are pre-eminent:

—Gov. Lester Maddox of Georgia has had an involvement with a variety of rightwing organizations over at least a decade. In the years immediately before his election as governor in 1966, he frequently was a public ally of the Birch Society, the Citizens Councils, and such rightwing gospelers as Billy James Hargis. He refused to disavow the Ku Klux Klan, obviously because to do so would have offended many of his friends. At the time he was elected, the Let Freedom Ring rightwing telephone messages for Atlanta were coming from his furniture store. After he was publicly embarrassed by a Let Freedom Ring attack on the American Legion, the telephone equipment was swiftly removed; shortly, the message service was back in action, with its equipment located in an American Opinion book store (distributor of John Birch literature). Despite an initial effort to establish a "moderate" image, Gov. Maddox did not otherwise disavow his old friends. Some members of the radical right won second-level political appointments. A few months after taking office, Maddox appeared at a national gathering of the Rev. Mr. Hargis' Christian Anti-Communism Crusade. His pronouncements on such subjects as the urban riots, Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.'s assassination and international affairs have continued to reflect the rightwing extremist line. Following the assassination, for instance, he said Dr. King had "carried out the policies and programs of Communists in this country."

—George Wallace, as governor of Alabama and later as a candidate for president, was the beneficiary of nationwide help from the radical right. Its members had been prominent in local efforts outside the South for his candidacy in presidential primaries in 1964. In the 1968 presidential campaign, they held key roles in the various state organizations created to support Wallace's candidacy. Wallace supporters used the rightist third parties established in many states as an outgrowth of the Congress of Conservatives, held in 1965 under the chairmanship of Kent Courtney, a rightist pamphleteer. These truly represented the outer fringes of American politics. Principal movers in some of the activities were Courtney; "Ace" Carter, who had been in the news over the years as an Alabama Klansman and Citizens Council leader; and former Sheriff James G. Clark of Selma, who also was popular on the John Birch Society speaking circuit.

Wallace's efforts also rested heavily in some areas upon the extremist Citizens Councils, Liberty Lobby and Congress of Freedom. Liberty Lobby began pushing the Wallace candidacy in 1965. It announced it was sending everyone on its mailing list a copy of a tabloid called "Stand Up for America—The Story of George Wallace." The Citizens Councils touted Wallace in their publications. In 1965 Wallace was speaker at the annual leadership conference of the Citizens Councils of America, at which one extremist speaker lengthily spiked the proceedings with anti-Semitic remarks that could only be described as rantings. Two months later Wallace was a main speaker at the annual convention of the Congress of Freedom, one of the wildest of all organizations of the radical right.

Some of the early Wallace campaign planning was at a meeting on November 8, 1965, in Montgomery attended by Ned Touchstone, Richard Cotton and John R. Rarick. Touchstone, whose plans for a "Draft Wallace" movement must have had either Wallace's approval or acquiescence, is widely known because of the crude racism and anti-Semitism of the Councilor, which he edits. Cotton is a radio commentator whose views are far beyond simple arch-conservatism; he sees a "Zionist-Jewish conspiracy" as all-pervasive and works with some of the country's leading hate peddlers. Rarick, then a Louisiana judge and later a congressman, has included such nationally known extremists as Col. Curtis B. Dall and Lt. Gen. Pedro Del Valle in his congressional campaign organization.

In Ohio, the Christian Conservative Party was the first group to promote the Wallace candidacy. Its headquarters, and the offices of the early statewide Ohio-for-Wallace group, were in a book store that distributed the most rancid propaganda of the radical right. A key figure in the effort there was a man who had advocated sending Negroes to Africa and who had suggested all Jews are Communists. In Missouri, one of the leading Wallace people was the Rev. Bill Beeney, of St. Louis. He sponsored the appearance of former Sheriff Clark when he was in Missouri as the campaign organizer. Beeney's splinter, the Counter Revolutionary Organization on Salvation and Service (CROSS), promoted the distribution of weapons to be used to combat uprisings. In some places representatives of the Patriotic Party, political arm of the Minutemen, had leading roles in the Wallace effort. Though there later was confusion about its endorsement, in 1967 the Patriotic Party chose Wallace as its presidential candidate. John Birch members had prominent roles in Wallace organizations in many states. Robert Shelton, imperial wizard of the United Klans of America, claimed more strength than his organization actually had but no doubt reflected its political allegiance when he said of Wallace: "We made him governor and we must make him president." Extremist followers of Wallace were not hanging on despite discouragement; he repeatedly refused to disavow individuals and organizations with which presidential candidates traditionally have disassociated themselves. In many ways his was the most radical major presidential campaign in the country's history.

—John Bell Williams, governor of Mississippi, had rightwing ties as open as those of Maddox and Wallace. His voting record as a congressman would have warmed the heart of any ultra-rightist. Most notably in his non-legislative activities, he was a supporter of the Citizens Councils and the Liberty Lobby. The latter organization was founded by Willis Carto, a former Birch Society worker who once proposed that American Negroes be shipped to Africa. Liberty Lobby sometimes has had anti-Semitic thrust, as well. The Washington Observer, which Group Research has called a thinly-disguised Liberty Lobby newsletter, once suggested that Jewish organizations were behind efforts to win U.S. approval of the U.S.-Soviet consular treaty to facilitate Jewish migration from Russia. It added that consequently "we not only got a Consular Treaty but also will now receive many more Jews as immigrants from Russia! How lucky can we be?" Among Liberty Lobby's founders was Tom Brady, later a Mississippi Supreme Court justice and a leading figure in the Citizens Councils.

—Among congressmen and senators, the South Carolina delegation often has led the South in support of the radical right. Rep. Mendel Rivers, one of Congress' most powerful men as chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, defended the John Birch Society on the floor of the House in 1961. He has appeared on the rightwing Manion Forum. In July of 1967 the American Security Council, a conservative pressure group that grew out of an industry loyalty-security program, said it had been retained by Rivers' committee (apparently without payment) to study the U.S. arms race with Russia..

Rep. Albert Watson of South Carolina was a featured speaker at a Washington gathering of the Liberty Lobby in January of 1967. Reps.

W. J. Bryan Dorn and E. Y. Berry of South Carolina have been Liberty Lobby supporters. Sen. J. Strom Thurmond has always been a favorite of the radical right in general, and probably no other member of Congress has so consistently satisfied the radical right's conception of what a legislator should be.

—In Louisiana, the strong influence of Leander Perez, Sr., a nationally-known white supremacist and anti-Semite, has waned in recent years but in 1968 he showed renewed strength in manipulations within the Louisiana Democratic Party organizaton and through his efforts on behalf of Wallace. With a political and economic power base of his own for five decades (through his domination of minerals-rich Plaquemines Parish), Perez has had the wherewithal to voice his bigotry without compromise; it came out not only explosively anti-Negro but thoroughly and elaborately anti-Semitic. To Perez, trends toward extending civil liberties in recent years have been results of the plotting of Communist Zionists who were manipulating inherently inferior Negroes in the civil rights movement. Perez has said frankly that he does not believe in democracy and many times has advocated violence. One would think that the influence of such a man could not stand the test of time, but 50 years after his emergence as a political figure in Louisiana he still can move events. It would appear that his loss of the influence he once exercised is related less to the outrageousness of his words and actions than to the fact that in Louisiana he is now regarded as gauche. Perez is no longer the kind of man the most "respectable" people want to be associated with. With shiftings toward moderation in Lousiana, and with a rising Negro vote there, it is probable that no one can quite take the place of Perez. Rep. John R. Rarick, a loyal Citizens Councils supporter, and Rep. Joe Waggoner, who has supported the Liberty Lobby, are, however, two public figures of influence who are friends of the radical right.

The five states represented by these men have been, of course, the wellsprings of Southern extremism in recent years. It is worthwhile to note, however, that the rightist Southern politicians seldom worked seriously to structurally build rightwing organizations. An exception to this observation was to be found in Mississippi in the 1950s and early 1960s, when prominent political figures such as Ross Barnett positively furthered the development of the Citizens Councils. But for the most part, the leading political rightwingers have not cared to seriously build separate, private organizations that might rival their own bases or force them at points to take steps that could be politically damaging. An example of this caution was the Talmadge organization's success in the mid-1950s in preventing the Citizens Councils from becoming a serious factor as an organization in Georgia. The big names of Georgia segregation — Herman Talmadge,

Marvin Griffin, Roy Harris, Lester Maddox, and others — sponsored the Georgia States Rights Council, the state's equivalent to the Citizens Councils. But apparently because of Talmadge's influence, it never was allowed to extend roots organizationally. Once a year its sponsors would gather for oratory. The council itself never became an apparatus that could be used by new Jacobins to challenge the old Jacobins politically. Politicians usually are jealous of their own control, and distrustful of power bases that might be used by someone else to outdo them at their own games.

Some politicians have learned that relying upon Birch members or encouraging their influence in political structures can be costly. One leading southern Republican, who was beneficiary of substantial Birch Society political action in the Goldwater campaign of 1964, said then they were welcome and that his only requirement was that they work for the party. They did. But in time their primary allegiance to the doctrines of the Birch Society caused difficulties. His assessment of their political participation, coming from a tough-minded political organizer, is worth noting. He said recently in private:

"Those people are no problem if you've got others who know what's going on, who'll fight them when necessary. I've never been concerned with the Birch Society as an organization. I've never seen their lines of organization and leadership galvanized behind a particular candidate or policy, with control that transcends other lines of leadership. They may get together before a meeting and talk about what to do. But I never saw evidence that a section leader ordered them to do something which they just carried out. On the other hand, the Birch Society attracts some people who are irresponsible, and the nature of the society gives them a feeling of personal power. That type, trying to satisfy his own need for power, concerns me more than the ideological commitments of Birchers in general. The Birch Society members usually are not really interested in politics on a continuing and realistic basis. The ones who helped us most in 1964 are mostly out of party work now and busy with fundamentalist-type religion of the anti-Communist, anti-National Council of Churches type."

EXPORTING SOUTHERN RADICALISM

In 1968 a basic question about rightist radicalism in Southern politics arrested the attention of the nation as a whole: Could it be exported, so that a peculiarly southern politician might lead the whole country to the extreme right? George Wallace set out to make his presidential candidacy a truly national campaign, in sharp contrast with the sectional campaign conducted in 1948 by Sen. Thurmond and the States Rights Party. He won a place on the ballot in every state, an accomplishment requiring prodigious effort and widespread support. Polls early in the campaign, and in mid-campaign, showed his popularity rising steadily across the nation.

Is Wallace a peculiarly southern politician? The argument can be made that he is simply a major political figure of the right who happens to be from the South; that other non-southern politicians, such as the late Sen. Joseph McCarthy of Wisconsin, have occupied essentially the same position in the political spectrum; and that accordingly there is nothing peculiarly southern about Wallace's politics. To a degree, this is true. It is easy to imagine that a national demagogue similar in many ways to Wallace might emerge from, for instance, the struggles over order in the schools of New York, Pennsylvania, or Ohio. But even so, such a figure would not represent the same phenomenon that Wallace represents. He embodies the essence and spirit of a century of peculiarly southern resistance to the national ideals, with all its sly subtleties alien to most of the country's people; disregard for constitutional processes in general, with an assumption (accepted in much of the South) that tradition and folk custom are more important than law; traditional southern "put-the-bottom-rung-on-top" class appeals; and regional paranoia unlike any to be found elsewhere. Even his political rhetoric, which often surprised his non-southern listeners (with such lines as "We gone put 'em under the jail"), reduced the sense of identity which non-southerners could have with him. Wallace was, after all, a man who had a strong political base at home partly because he had exploited many people's sense of inferiority as southerners and their conviction that they were being looked down upon because of what they were. ("Folks down here in Alabama are just as refined and cultured as folks anywhere!" Wallace often says, and these words invariably bring applause from people who apparently need to be told just this.) In his last speech of the campaign, on the Georgia State Capitol steps, Wallace returned repeatedly to his regional themes. He said Georgians were tired of being looked down upon, and that they were as good as any bureaucrats with briefcases. He spoke of the need to show that a southerner could be elected president. The speech again underscored that, if Wallace was not a sectional candidate, at least he was a particular kind of peculiarly southern candidate running nationally.

The election results indicated that if the nation is soon to be led to the extreme right by a demagogue, as it may be, he will have to be something more than a demagogue of provincial thought processes, rhetoric and spirit. Rightwing radicalism in the South may help him substantially; but in its provincialism, it has peculiarities that only southerners can identify with.

The early poll showings reflected a strong general discontent in the country which Wallace could marshal for the pollsters but which he could not translate into votes for the presidency of the United States. His 13 per cent nationally can be construed as alarming or as small enough to be reassuring. What is more important than the percentage is the distribution of his vote: It almost perfectly reflected the southern nature of his candidacy and the unwillingness of those outside the South to follow him.

Wallace carried only Alabama, with 65 per cent of the votes; Mississippi, with 63 per cent; Louisiana, with 48; Georgia, with 43; and Arkansas, with 40. Twenty years earlier Thurmond had carried Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina. There was, then, little difference between the outcome for Wallace, with respect to his area of strong appeal, and the results for Thurmond, an easily identifiable southern sectional candidate. Wallace carried most of the "inner" South and did more poorly in the "outer" South, more poorly still in border states, and more poorly still in the rest of the nation. The pattern, in terms of the "southernness" of his appeal, was clear.

In the "outer" South, which he had hoped to carry, there were these results for him: Virginia, 24 per cent; Tennessee, 34; North Carolina, 31; Florida, 29; and Texas, 19. (In South Carolina, an "inner" South state, he apparently was limited to 31 per cent largely by the influence of Thurmond and other influential Republicans who presented Richard Nixon as perhaps less desirable for the South but more likely to win.) In the border states, he won these votes: Kentucky, 18 per cent; Maryland, 15; Missouri, 11; Delaware, 13; and West Virginia, 10. Significantly, in typical conservative states distant from the South, he made some of his worst showings; for instance, in Arizona (where Barry Goldwater was regaining his seat in the Senate), Wallace had nine per cent, and in Kansas, 10. He obviously was not seen primarily as a conservative in these states, but primarily as a southern radical.

In three states where he had served as a vehicle for very strong protest votes in the Democratic primaries of 1964, he did very poorly as a genuine candidate for the White House. He won 15 per cent in Maryland, where he had polled 43 per cent in the 1964 primary; 12 per cent in Indiana, where he had 30 per cent in 1964; and eight per cent in Wisconsin, where he had polled 34 per cent in 1964. These votes indicated that although many people four years earlier had been willing to vote for him in plebiscites on their discontent, most did not see his politics as suitable for a national presidential candidate.

Surely his peculiarly southern appeal was the basic factor in his insignificant showings in such states as Maine, where he won two per cent; Vermont, three per cent; New Hampshire, four per cent; and Hawaii, one per cent. In the final analysis, too, he lost much of the blue-collar support he had seemed to have during what might be called the rhetorical protest stage of the campaign, before the White House was at stake. His results were poor in all industrial states. In Michigan he received only 10 per cent of the votes; in Ohio, 12 per cent; in New Jersey, nine per cent; in Illinois and Pennsylvania, eight per cent; and in California, seven per cent.

The Wallace campaign, with strong financing, nationwide organization, and almost even-time treatment by the mass media in general, scored well enough to cause concern about the extent of rightwing extremist feeling in the country. But what it revealed about that was not surprising. Certainly it did not indicate that the South can mold and direct the nation's extremism according to the designs and emphases of its peculiar, provincial variety of rightwing radicalism.

RIGHTISTS IN AND OUT OF OFFICE

The kind of political extremism that has prevailed or at least has been strongly represented in much of the South for decades is not substantially the product of radical national or regional organizations. Southern political rightists frequently have aided the organized right; but they have seldom been created by it. Nor is there convincing evidence that the election of a radical governor, such as Maddox or Wallace, has greatly increased the membership and activity of such organizations as the Birch Society, again with the lone exception of Mississippi during the era of Citizens Councils strength and their alliance with Gov. Ross Barnett. No one could have been more of an "anything goes" radical rightist than Maddox. But as he approached the middle of his term in office, there seemed to be no great increase in organized radical rightist activity in Georgia attributable to his influence. The John Birch Society in the Atlanta area in mid-1968 evidently had no more than 500 active members (one former member scoffed at any suggestion that it had more than 200). That figure represented no substantial increase and possibly a decline since 1964, despite intense new organizational efforts. The Citizens Councils still had made no inroads in Georgia, which always had been barren land for them. In Atlanta, where a council existed in name, it was hardly more than a mailing address. The Klan's membership apparently had not risen appreciably. Evidence of Klan activity seemed, in fact, substantially less than in some recent years and largely amounted to an occasional peaceful demonstration in Atlanta. (The Georgia Grand Dragon of the United Klans, Calvin Craig, resigned his Klan office in early 1968, indicating he would seek public office. He was amicably sitting down with Negroes regularly as a participant in Atlanta's Model Cities program, and he sought their votes in an unsuccessful race for sheriff.) When the preacher-evangelists of the radical right, in particular Billy James Hargis and Fred Schwarz, came through Georgia in 1967, their crowds were no larger than before. A visit by Robert Welch of the Birch Society in February of 1967 attracted about 400 people, a much smaller crowd than he had drawn in 1966.

PROPAGANDA IN PRINT

If the radical organizations have not burgeoned everywhere, nevertheless the word they bear about public issues has. The theory of the Birch Society and its allies often has served as a codification and rationalization of existing prejudices, extending and enforcing them. Much of this has been done through publications and radio.

Among the principal rightist publications widely distributed in the South is Human Events, started in 1944 as a four-page newsletter by some prominent people (including Gen. Robert E. Wood and Charles E. Lindbergh) who had been associated with the isolationist America First Committee. Human Events at one time had close ties with the Birch Society, H. L. Hunt's Life Line organization, and other radical right groups. Human Events and the Birch Society have jointly offered their followers bulk subscriptions to Human Events and the Society's American Opinion magazine, at reduced rates. Many of the sponsors of Human Events in recent years have been leading Birch members, and the tabloid-size paper continues to push a standard set of far-right views and proposals. It cannot be as clearly labeled radical right as some other publications. Much of its content may be described as very conservative but not radical rightist in the narrow sense, consisting of articles by such people as Barry Goldwater, Ralph de Toledano, and Max Rafferty and reprints from conservative newspapers such as the Chicago Tribune and the Charleston News and Courier. It offers a combination of far-rightist viewpoints along with very conservative views that are more in the mainstream of public exchange. Its national circulation has reached an estimated 180,000, and it appears to be distributed very widely in the South.

Several publications of the radical right originate in the South. They are produced primarily for Southern readers. These include the Citizens Councils' magazine, the Citizen, and various pamphlets and books which that organization pushes; the Augusta Courier, a weekly tabloid put-together of clippings and extreme personal views published by old-time segregationist politician Roy Harris, of Augusta, Georgia, president of the Citizens Councils of America; the Independent American, a small monthly newspaper published by Free Men Speak, Inc., of New Orleans, whose principal voices have been Kent and Phoebe Courtney; the Southern States Industrial Council Bulletin, published semi-monthly in Nashville by a council with some large corporate support whose stated views parallel most of the program of the radical right; the Birmingham Independent, whose readership is local; and the Councilor, publication of the Louisiana Citizens Councils.

Other radical right publications with some influence in the South include the Birch Society's American Opinion magazine, a monthly, and its Bulletin, a monthly in which Robert Welch tells members how they may implement the society's program first by reading and then by action; Life Lines, a four-page commentary put out three times a week by H. L. Hunt's Life Lines Foundation; the Dan Smoot Report, a four-page, letter-size weekly published in Dallas by Dan Smoot, who previously was commentator for Hunt's defunct radio program "Facts Forum;" the Christian Crusade, a monthly magazine, and the Weekly Crusader, a bulletin, published at Tulsa by Billy James Hargis; Liberty Letter, monthly official organ of the Liberty Lobby, whose 210,000 circulation nationally makes it the biggest periodical clearly representing the radical right; and News & Views, a monthly published by Maj. Edgar Bundy's Church League of America.

An arresting fact about all these publications is their sameness of viewpoint. The standard line, from which there is little variation, is opposition to the United Nations, the poverty program and the Supreme Court; hysterical exaggeration of the progress of internal communism; advocacy of a return of prayer to the public schools; opposition to civil rights legislation, with assertions that civil rights organizations are Communist pawns; a belief that the schools, press, churches and other basic institutions are Communist-infiltrated or at best dominated by "liberal-socialist" theory; and proposals to basically alter the federal system. There are variations on such questions as whether to support a third party and whether to dismantle the federal government by repealing the income tax and barring it from professional and business services (as the Liberty Lobby's proposed Liberty Amendment would do) or whether to simply limit income tax rates by amendment except in time of war (as the Southern States Industrial Council proposes).

PROPAGANDA ON THE AIR

The message of the radical right is much stronger in the South than elsewhere on radio stations. In fact, radio appears to be the most formidable weapon in the radicals' arsenal. A reasonable estimate indicates that 7,000 programs of the radical right are heard weekly across the nation, and a sizable portion of these are on southern stations. One reason for their proliferation has been the sluggishness with which liberals and others have moved to challenge them. Now when licenses are up for renewal before the Federal Communications Commission, questions occasionally are being raised about whether a station heavily dispensing radical rightist views is providing the kind of balance on public issues which the FCC requires. But each challenge must be well documented. Further, a station may escape giving equal time to those attacked or to the causes they represent if there is no well-prepared request for the time; and when a station goes unchallenged at the time of a program it can argue that it would have granted equal time if this had been requested.

The South's affinity for radical right radio programs is worth close scrutiny. The region is still less urban than most of the nation, and a large part of its population regularly listens to small, local stations. It is exactly these low-budget stations, often without network ties or other good sources of programming, which most often use the radical right's prepared propaganda. The rightist evangelists, especially, have appeal in the South. One of their byproducts appears to be in influencing local preachers (usually of the smaller, fundamentalist sects) who use the radio simultaneously for jeremiads and fund appeals to sustain the program.

The Rev. Carl McIntyre's "Twentieth Century Reformation Hour" has led the field in the South, as well as nationally. Organized in 1958, this daily program was being heard on 313 stations by 1962. Its biggest forward movement came during and immediately after the general national upsurge of the right in 1964. At one point during that year the number of stations was 448, with 201 of these (45 per cent) in the South. In 1965 the number of stations exceeded 600. The program apparently continued to be strong in 1968, with about half the stations in the southern states. Much of McIntyre's appeal is to those who dislike the National Council of Churches and the directions in which almost all the major Protestant denominations have been moving on social and theological questions. McIntyre himself was barred from continued service as a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. (now the United Presbyterian Church) in 1936. That church's General Assembly, its highest governing body, accused him of defaming the character of fellow Christians, causing "dissension and strife" and engendering suspicion and ill will. He has been a leading figure in the American Council of Churches and the International Council of Churches, splinter groups established as rivals of, respectively, the National and World Councils of Churches. McIntyre's appeal to religious separatism and fundamentalism is enhanced in the South by his longstanding opposition to civil rights legislation and statements like the one in which he said talk about racial brotherhood is only Communist propaganda. He is stridently anti-Catholic and in the past has been allied with anti-Semites. In the spring of 1967 he held a Washington meeting of his American Council of Churches to charge suppression of his radio program by the FCC under the "fairness doctrine" on equal time; but the program appears to be still going strong.

The progress of another broadcast of the religious rightists, the "Christian Crusade Radio Ministry," a daily program by Billy James Hargis, also is especially noteworthy. It is sponsored by Hargis' Christian Crusade, which derives funds from various sources, and by contributions it requests on the air. In 1962 it had reached a peak, with 200 radio and 12 television outlets in 46 states. The next year it was forced to retrench, keeping about 50 radio stations and a few TV outlets. In 1964, with the whole radical right feeling an upsurge in connection with the Goldwater candidacy, the Christian Crusade program was back over the 100 mark in stations and by the next year it had 237 stations in 37 states, Canada and Mexico. In 1967, it had 208 U. S. stations, 86 of which were in the southern states. Thus, southern stations accounted for more than 41 per cent of Hargis' total.

Hargis has emerged in a short time as one of the two or three leading forces of the radical right nationally. In the South, his organization may have more impact than any other national rightist propaganda force. He preaches an orthodox rightist ideology, and in 1967 he seemed to be stepping up his appeals to racism. Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. was "a part of the whole Communist conspiracy," he told an Atlanta audience. He went on to scoff at the idea that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People speaks for Negroes. "They have never allowed a Negro to head their organization," he declared. His line generally has been that all civil rights efforts were related to communism and effectuated by dupes and fellow-travelers. His use of the race issue was not new: As early as the 1957 school desegregation struggle at Little Rock, he was defending white supremacy. He distributed a pamphlet on the Little Rock situation written by Joseph P. Kamp, a veteran rightwing extremist. Hargis has had a background of close association with extreme anti-Semites such as the late Gerald Winrod and Allen Zoll.

Maj. Edgar Bundy's Church League of America has a 15-minute program which from its outset in 1962 had a substantial southern representation. Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia and Florida were four of the eight states reached by the program the first year. It remains a small operation by comparison with Hargis' and McIntyre's. In 1968 the South apparently had more than its share of the Bundy programs, though not as many as some Western states.

Howard Kershner's "Commentary on the News," sponsored by the Christian Freedom Foundation, Inc., also had found the South fertile ground. The number of its stations in the region is currently uncertain but, in 1962, 43 of the 148 stations carrying it, or 29.1 per cent, were in Southern states. The total number had risen by 1965 to 362 stations, including substantial increases in the South.

In addition to these rightist programs with specifically rightist appeals, others have been unusually successful. "Life Lines," the 15-minute daily program heavily supported by Hunt's petroleum and food concerns, was organized in 1958. By 1961 it was carried by 200 stations nationally, and by the next year the figure had risen to 304. In 1963, 60 per cent of the 289 "Life Line" stations were in the South. In 1967, the figure was 236, or 47 per cent of the 500 stations. The "Manion Forum," which uses radio-solicited contributions and private industries' gifts to present Clarence Manion and his guests, has always had a disproportionate southern base. In 1959, when it had only 89 stations, 38 were in the South. In 1965, its 267 radio stations included 105, or 39 per cent, in the South. By 1967 the "Manion Forum" had been substantially reduced in scope nationally and was even more southern-oriented. Its 155 radio and TV stations included 101 in the South, 65 per cent of the total.

The Birch Society's radio program, relatively new, was making headway in the South in 1967 but how extensively was uncertain. America's Future, Inc., which might be called a fellow-traveler of the radical right, had a much less extensive but still disproportionate distribution in the South. In 1961, it had 371 stations nationally, with 121 of these, or 33 per cent, in southern states. The programs of the Citizens Councils Forum, which is supported by wealthy businessmen and which in the past had a subsidy from the State of Mississippi, were being used by more than 150 stations nationally in 1967, with a large part of this distribution in the South. The weekly "Radio Edition" of the Courtneys' Independent American newspaper was being broadcast in 1967 on 33 stations in about 15 states, most of these in the South.

Of the major programs only the "Dan Smoot Report" could be verifiably determined to have a less-than-proportionate distribution in the South. Analysis of the 1965 totals indicates that 20 of the 138 stations broadcasting the Smoot program were in the South, slightly less than seven per cent.

Some stations present a steady diet of the radical right's national offerings and supplement it with local rightist political programs and, frequently, religious fundamentalism. It is possible, in a few cities, to find a rightist program for almost every hour on some local station. In Birmingham in 1967, one might swing through a succession of programs, with hardly an interruption, by dialing six radio stations. On week days, starting at 7:55 a. m. and ending at 9 p.m., the right-winger's radio log included "Paul Harvey," "Christian Crusade," "Conservative Viewpoint," "Paul Harvey," "Paul Harvey," "Fulton Lewis III," and "Life Line;" and on Sundays, between 9:30 a.m. and 9:45 p.m., the "Rev. Ferrell Griswold" (a local minister and ally of the Birch Society), "The Independent Presents" (a local rightwing program), "Dan Smoot," "Christian Crusade," "John Birch Report," "Congressman John Buchanan" (a rightwing Republican), "Citizens Council Forum," "Manion Forum," and the "R. K. Scott Commentary." In Birmingham the extreme rightwinger need hardly ever be without radio inspiration.

The dissemination of rightist views through broadcasting has unique significance, despite the fact that ultra-conservative opinions also are extensively distributed in the region's general-circulation newspapers. The latter will not be examined here. It might be said in passing that ultra-conservative newspaper columnists usually are sustained through normal syndication payments rather than through organizations and subsidies which exist only to promote the special causes of the radical right.

THE NATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

Among national organizations of the radical right, the John Birch Society remains the only one organized substantially across the South. (The Citizens Councils, strong in some areas, are excepted here because they are not truly national.) Some light on the degree of Birch Society penetration of the South is shed by a study done by Dr. Fred W. Grupp Jr., then of the University of Wisconsin's Department of Political Science. He surveyed members of the Birch Society in 1966 to determine, in part, how the individual attitudes of members might be correlated with the Society's official positions. He concluded there was wide disparity. Especially among the members recruited in the big expansion of 1964 and 1965, he found a very large number who did not accept the full "party line." Of principal interest here, however, is the fact that the Birch Society, though it would not reveal to him its mailing list, agreed to mail his questionnaires to a cross-section of its membership. From the replies received, Dr. Grupp calculated that 26 per cent of the Birch membership was in the 11 Southern states, which have 27 per cent of the nation's population. Since the best estimates of national Birch membership at that time were between 75,000 and 80,000, this percentage suggests a southern membership of 19,000 or slightly more. There was substantial variation state to state. From various evidences, the writer concludes that the following situation existed in early 1968. Alabama was the third state in the country in Birch members, with the highest number per capita. Texas and Florida were close to Alabama among southern states in membership. Mississippi had more than its per capita share: probably about 2,000 members. A middle rank could be assigned to Georgia, which appeared to have three per cent of the Birch membership (its total population being approximately two per cent of the nation's). Some other southern states, most notably Tennessee and North Carolina, apparently had substantially less Birch membership than their populations would indicate if membership were evenly distributed across the country. Of the remaining southern states, it appeared that Virginia and South Carolina were closer to the Texas-

Florida pattern and Arkansas and Louisiana closer to the Georgia mid-rank in Birch membership.

In some ways, the South seems to have been deliberately short-changed by the Birch Society organizationally, though it may be that only recently has the southern membership become substantial enough to justify a concentrated effort. In 1966, the Society had a chief public relations director and regional public relations directors for the East, Midwest, Southwest and Washington. No resident public relations director was in the Deep South even by early 1968. When the Society went all-out in general public appeal through newspaper advertising with a 16-page, multi-color newspaper supplement, it placed this special section in major newspapers in Los Angeles, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, Pittsburgh, St. Louis, Milwaukee, Indianapolis and Dallas. (In Houston, the section was mailed directly to homes.) No major southern newspapers outside Texas had the supplement. In 1965, a national fund drive brought in $200,000 through testimonial dinners ($50 and $25 per plate) in Los Angeles, Phoenix, New York, Chicago, and Dallas. Again, except for Dallas, the South had no such events. The Society has had field offices in White Plains, N. Y. (Eastern); Glenview, Ill. (Midwestern); San Marino, Calif. (Western); Washington; and Dallas (supplanting Houston in 1965, primarily for the Southwest). The Society had no such office for the South outside Texas.

Much of the Society's strength in the South is in small towns and cities of 50,000 population or less, such as Americus, Georgia, where racial difficulties apparently stimulated growth. From one smaller city to the next, there are great variations and many gaps. As for the larger urban areas, a map would call for pins to indicate relatively strong membership in all the major cities of Alabama, Georgia, Arkansas and Texas; most of those in Florida (and in particular, Jacksonville, St. Petersburg, St. Augustine, West Palm Beach, Fort Lauderdale, Daytona, and Sarasota); some cities of Tennessee; several cities of Louisiana and Mississippi; some cities in North Carolina, though not as all-inclusively as among the large cities of South Carolina; and some cities of Virginia.

Growth appears to be spasmodic. Charles D. Nelson, "major coordinator" of the Society for Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida, said in an interview for this report that 1966 was a slack year in his three states following big gains in 1965. He said he expected a surge in membership with the 1968 political campaign and the attendant heightening of political interest. For his area, particularly, that appeared to be a reasonable prediction, especially in view of the George Wallace candidacy. Birch membership does seem to rise and fall with the intensity of interest in politics. Although 1966 was a bad year in general for Birch membership, it was a good year in Atlanta and its suburbs; the number of chapters there increased from 17 to 33 between the spring of 1966 and the spring of 1967. During most of that time a heated state political campaign was under way, with several candidacies which were encouraging to the radical right. (The Birch Society was divided in Georgia over the candidacies of Lester Maddox, Democrat, and Howard (Bo) Callaway, Republican.)

THE "SEGREGATION ACADEMIES"

The increase in the number of private, segregated schools in the South during the past few years has raised the spectre, in the minds of some observers at least, of a substantial increase in rightwing influences in education. The "segregation academies," schools founded specifically to maintain segregation (though this frequently was denied), began to appear in a number of states in the early 1960s, when the reality of public school desegregation was at hand. The passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and subsequent implementation of its school desegregation provisions by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare further expanded the private-school movement. Between 1965 and 1967, the number of private, segregated schools increased to about 200, with about 40,000 students, according to the Southern Education Reporting Service. The number of schools and students remained about the same during 1967 and into 1968. Louisiana, with about 65 schools enrolling about 16,500 students, and Virginia, with about 30 schools enrolling about 12,000, were the leading states in the new private-school movement. Many of the schools were sponsored by people identified with rightwing causes. The Citizens Councils encouraged them and founded some of its own. The extent of direct rightwing influence upon the pupils was difficult to define, but clearly it was substantially present.

Gov. Lester Maddox said in 1967 he would like to see 100 more private schools in Georgia. He obviously was encouraging the "segregation academies" rather than the educational purpose of older private schools, which had no primarily racial motivation and some of which were integrated. Georgia had only four such academies when the governor spoke, and since then the movement has not spread in the state. Gov. Maddox himself, it is clear, identified the private-school movement with defiance of federal desegregation requirements and probably also with conservative influences in the classroom. He said he would like to find some way to make state tuition grants but acknowledged this would be difficult. It was proving, in fact, to be impossible, or nearly so. The federal courts had knocked down other states' plans for subsidizing schools obviously established with the intent of evading civil rights requirements. Gov. Maddox made no further moves on the matter, having encountered intense resistance from other high-ranking state officials in Georgia.

The progression of cases through the federal courts gave every evidence that shortly no way would be left for states to give impetus to the private-school movement. There remained the question of whether a large number of "seg academies" might yet survive because of strong private financial support. Some seemed likely to do so. They were beginning to fill a demand for quality private education which existed apart from the desire to evade desegregation requirements. As these schools (which were not in the majority) tended to follow the patterns of older private schools, they seemed to be unlikely future vessels for the perpetuation of racism and rightwing political philosophy; at least, no more likely to be than private schools in general across the country. The tuition costs of private schools genuinely striving for quality in education made it apparent that they would be limited in number.

There are, however, numerous "segregation academies" whose genesis and whose support clearly suggest that their pupils will be subject to rightwing extremist and racist influences. Dr. T. E. Wannamaker, a leading South Carolina spokesman for private schools, is a favorite of the white Citizens Councils and the John Birch Society. Wade Hampton Academy at Orangeburg, S. C., of which he is president, is one of several schools that award their graduates a lapel pin consisting of a Confederate flag and the word "Survivor" underneath. It symbolizes, Dr. Wannamaker said, "the fight to maintain great principles such as the value of truthfulness, of honor, of courage and integrity, and the great principle that governments should be governments of laws and not of men." Dr. Wannamaker discounts the role of libraries and laboratories. "Our books today tend to mis-educate as well as to educate," he said.

The inferiority of many of the segregation academies is clear, and some states have lately moved to tighten requirements for private schools. "All you have to do to open a private school in South Carolina is to have a spare stable," Cyril Busbee, the state superintendent of education, said in 1967. The state was moving toward standards for the private schools, which in some areas were undermining the local public schools by attracting their students, teachers and community support.

The spread of segregated academies, with which John Birchers and old-line segregationists frequently have been identified, appears to be encountering now the hard reality that in the long run a private school will cost parents substantial amounts of money and will be depriving the children if the main purpose is espousal of views such as Dr. Wannamaker's. Some will become more respectable. Others are likely to die. Their long-range impact thus seems much smaller than it might have seemed two years ago, when state tuition grant programs were still alive.

In the area of public education, the South has the same kind of influences at work on its schools as do other regions, as well as its own more pronounced racist pressures. These are difficult to measure quantitatively. Some evidence exists, however, that specifically rightwing pressure on public schools is no more pervasive in the region than in many other parts of the country. The Commission on Professional Rights and Responsibilities of the National Education Association, having examined rising harassment of teachers and schools, reported in 1966 that the John Birch Society was "clearly in first place as a trouble-making agency." Among others it cited were the Dan Smoot Reports and the Christian Anti-Communism Crusade. Significantly, it said 90 per cent of the complaints of red-baiting and book censorship came from three states: California, Michigan and Ohio. Similarly, Mrs. Jennelle Moorhead, national president of the Parent-Teacher Association, blamed rightwing pressures for much of the loss of about 340,000 PTA members during the preceding three years but indicated most of the trouble had come not from the South but from other regions.

THE SOUTHERN RELIGIOUS WARP

The South, it probably can be said then, has both a vulnerability to rightwing doctrine and some resistance to formal organization of the John Birch kind. This vulnerability and this resistance are both related to the peculiar apartness of the region's culture. Although that apartness is declining under the constant impact of national norms and national outlooks, furthered through mass communications and national organizations such as religious denominational structures, it still exists.

One reason such organizations as the Birch Society have not fared especially well is that the South has a strong inclination to turn toward its traditional structures, including political forms, for expression and participation. If one lives in a state whose governor is a Lester Maddox or a George Wallace, has congressmen who vote to the satisfaction of the Americans for Constitutional Action and the Citizens Councils, is under a steady radio bombardment from rightwing propagandists and rightwing fundamentalist preachers, and lives in a city dominated by reactionary elements, who needs the John Birch Society? It becomes a foreign element in the native habitat. This kind of native habitat is not universal in the South, of course, but it exists in the areas which otherwise might be most receptive to national rightwing groups.

The South's paradoxical vulnerability to and resistance of rightwing organization also is clearly related to its religious peculiarity. The most church-oriented part of the country, the South is also the region most noted for fundamentalist, pietistic Protestantism. This has special pertinence inasmuch as even organizations of the radical right which do not have a religious orientation, such as the John Birch Society, appear to have a membership strongly imbued with literalistic and pietistic religious views (of Catholic, as well as Protestant, varieties). "The preponderant majority of our members are deeply religious," Charles D. Nelson, the Birch coordinator for Alabama, Florida and Mississippi, has said. Ira S. Rohter, in his study of the radical right mentioned earlier, compared a sample group of radical rightists with an arbitrarily-chosen control group and found a very strong correlation between radicalism of the right and fundamentalist religious loyalties. Two students of fundamentalism and the radical right, Jack Dodson and Camille Vandervoort of the University of Houston, have suggested "the distinct possibility of the 'holinization' of the politics of the extreme right in the contemporary American society." In 1968, cars could be seen in the South bearing two bumper stickers: "God Give Us a Leader" and "Wallace '68."

The dominant churches in the South have been those which, in the broad sweep of Protestant history, would have to be called radical, part of the left wing of the Reformation. These were the churches that introduced the most radical changes in church government, including forms more democratic than previously existed and forms lending themselves to localism and extreme individualism. In theology, these were the churches that were most radical in altering views of the relationship between free will on the one hand and divine sovereignty on the other, asserting that not only was each man his own priest and not only did he fully make his own choice but that he could expect instant experience of his own salvation. This was the final triumph of religious individualism and personal pietism.

These were the churches which elsewhere were sects, characterized by their minority status, their feeling of alienation from a hostile society around them, their sense of apartness from the secular order. But in the South, what was a despised minority elsewhere (the Baptists) became the majority church. Southern Protestantism did not feel itself antagonistic toward the secular order around it; it began to be shaped by, identify with, and support that society.

The dominant Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians became the state church of the South, defending the status quo and the entrenched, and sanctifying public policy. The most bizarre, and by most standards anti-Christian, instance of this was in church defenses of slavery. That tradition was extended through the period of segregation's decline, so that Monday newspapers depicted ushers standing with grim faces and folded arms blocking church doorways to Negroes while, inside, ministers talked of love and sin. All these evidences of the obscuring of Christian ethical demands within Christian churches have their parallels outside the region, of course, but the southern Church's history has made it especially weak in the face of today's moral confrontations and such phenomena as radicalism of the right, with all its denials of the universality of man's humanity. A "southern theology" is central in this phenomenon. It has been in the making for a long time.

Samuel S. Hill, an authority on religion in the South, has surmised that the southern religious pattern was already set by 1800. In early colonial times, the region was not extensively religious. Anglicanism was the main force, but its reach was limited. Then, during the Great Awakening period of the 1740's, the Presbyterians spread rapidly, with an evangelical thrust which nevertheless had strong intellectual accompaniment. In the 1750's, the Baptists began a long burst of growth. From 1770, the Methodists spread rapidly, with camp meetings as a principal means. The Baptists and the Methodists, more than any others, went where the people were and offered them a faith they could quickly respond to.

The South, James McBride Dabbs has written, institutionalized revivalism in the late 19th century. Other parts of the country moved on past. But the South stayed with revivalism and its heavy emphasis on emotion, simple doctrine and quick assurance of salvation. In fact, the South distorted each of the great founders of Protestantism. Martin Luther had asserted each individual's ability to interpret the Scriptures, but the South made a preposterous anti-intellectual, individualistic fetish of that principle. John Wesley had emphasized free-will in the attainment of salvation, but he did not tear free-will loose from divine sovereignty; many of his southern Methodist followers and others did, all but making man sovereign in determining his salvation through instant self-declarations of conversion. John Calvin's strong views on social responsibility were abandoned by southern Presbyterians; Calvin had asserted that the Church must be the social conscience of the land, but for decades southern Presbyterians largely ignored that doctrine, replacing it with an extreme view on the separation of church and state which facilitated the suspension of ethical judgments on state affairs. The southern Baptists also left their ancient moorings. They have sometimes traced their origins to the Anabaptists of the sixteenth century; but their views of social responsibility became much narrower than the Anabaptist assertion that each man was responsible for the deeper morality of his day-to-day actions and for the tone of the society around him. In the great retreat from concern about the social order, Dabbs has written, the Southern Church "avoided the core problems and dabbled around the edges with a bunch of blue laws." In the early stage, said W. J. Cash, the South needed and received "a faith, not of liturgy and prayer book, but of primitive frenzy and the blood sacrifice — often of fits and jerks and barks — . . . a personal God, a God for the individualist . . . ." Cash also noted a strange contrast: the South's love of pleasure alongside its Puritanism. How could hedonism be reconciled to Puritanism? Cash concluded that this could be done only if religious faith and daily life were kept separate. New England Puritans had done this, too; but in the South, Puritanism lived on and became a dominant faith.

The relevance of all this to radical rightist influence in the South is clear. Rightist views in the United States are commonly grounded in narrow, anti-intellectual views of the world; in moralistic certitude; in a view that opposing ideas are satanic; in a devotion to old practices and old values with the assumption that these are under attack from evil forces; and in an assertion of individualism which, although rightists often are themselves subject to herding, becomes an official virtue. These threads of rightist radicalism are obviously also the central elements in the Southern church's peculiarity (its heresy, perhaps, from the viewpoint of mainstream Protestantism).

The revivalistic nature of the big Protestant denominations in the South has been substantially modified in recent years. These churches' clergy are better educated than in the frontier days, and increasingly influenced by mainstream religious ideas. The institutions themselves are more sophisticated. But much of the old influence remains.

Membership figures suggest just how pervasive has been the influence of the peculiar Southern church. We start with the fact that the South is far more church-oriented than any other part of the nation. The percentage of people who are current members of southern Protestant churches is about twice as high as in any other part of the country, and three times as high as in some. This is the only region where current members of Protestant churches far outnumber the members of Catholic and Jewish congregations. Only in the South do Protestant churches have an actual majority of the total population. The South had, in 1952, 4.1 churches per 2,000 people, compared with 1.4 in the Northeast, 2.4 in the North Central region, and 1.5 in the West. Beyond this, we must consider what churches southerners are in. Two examples suffice for the Deep South. In Mississippi, Baptists, Methodists, Presbyterians and members of the Disciples of Christ account for 94 per cent of the population; in Georgia, for 93 per cent. Baptist and Methodist memberships comprise the great bulk of this membership.

Dr. Earl D. C. Brewer, a sociologist who directs the Religious Research Center at Emory University, has said: "The Klan is a child of the main religious forces in the South. The connection becomes closest in the case of the extreme sects. But the fundamentalist thrust is at the center of the southern brand of Protestanism."

As the major Protestant denominations that have been traditional in the South move away from the core of fundamentalism, a largely unnoticed phenomenon is taking place which could have profound import for the future. The Pentecostal-Holiness and Church of God denominations, which reach back to the fundamentalism of old, are growing astonishingly. The best evidence is that while the region's population was increasing 37 per cent between 1926 and 1952, membership in the Pentecostal-Holiness churches in the South increased 1,000 per cent and in the Church of God congregations 659 per cent. Dr. Brewer has remarked upon the South's impact on the nation through the out-migration of its religious fundamentalists; the spread of the newer fundamentalist faiths is likely to have similar impact. They carry on with the kind of simplistic, emotional, salvationist and intellectually indifferent strains that earlier went into the mass Protestant faiths of the South, before the memberships became predominantly middle class.

In the South's political life, Lester Maddox is the peak of a largely-concealed iceberg. He combines political primitivism with religious primitivism. Far more than most political analysts seem to realize, his appeal is to the religious simplism of a sub-culture in the South which lies beneath the middle class or at its lower edges and whose extent is told in the figures on poverty in the South's poorest region. Gov. Maddox is often seen as a demagogue cut from the familiar cloth of old-style demagoguery in the South. But in many ways he is different from the cynical political charlatans. He is the South's brand of religious and political simplism run amuck. He is the logical extension, in high office, of the moods and feelings that come from those origins. It is no accident that he is both a fundamentalist Protestant and a rightwing political extremist.

THE FUTURE

It is these phenomena, essentially indigenous, which must claim first priority in any evaluation of the future of rightwing radicalism in the South. The John Birch Society is alien, with a limited middle-class appeal, though it may yet have greater impact. The Ku Klux Klan is a small fossil from the not-so-distant past. The Citizens Councils, created in the post-1954 convulsion, have been steadily dying and are of little consequence today even in Mississippi. The pure ideology of many other political extremist groups from outside the region is too complex and too pseudo-rational for all but a relatively few paranoiac southerners. But those preaching "doctrines wholly unrelated to reality," as President Kennedy described them, who can combine these nostrums with the emotional set and the religious forms indigenous to the South will be of greater significance.

A George Wallace has appeal largely based upon petulance and bitter defiance, and this is satisfying to those who feel threatened by modernism and the world at large. A Lester Maddox has this same "strike-back" appeal, but also the moralistic appeal of a profoundly ignorant neo-Puritan who sees many devils, all of them on the left. He represents the rightwing "holinization of politics." On the South's airwaves, this tendency is fed best by the radio preachers and other rightwingers who at least superficially identify themselves with fundamentalist religious values.

The counter-weights are many, of course. Major southern religious denominations are moving rapidly away from the peculiarity of their past. Even the Pentecostal-Holiness churches tend to change somewhat as they move into the cities and the suburbs, and as many of their members continue on the "up" economic escalator taking them into the middle class. All these churches are subject, finally, to the challenge of their own religion when they begin reading it without the blinders that the South's peculiarities imposed. The region's racial and poverty crises already are beginning to receive fruitful attention from many churches whose theologies only a few years ago made them oblivious, at best. This new attention to realities will not mix well with "doctrines wholly unrelated to reality."

The South for some time probably will remain a part of the country oddly susceptible to radicalism of the right, but also resistant. It is not likely to lead the nation to the right. Its George Wallaces and Lester Maddoxes will have too limited an appeal elsewhere. Conversely, a Barry Goldwater (despite his success in five southern states) in time loses appeal among southern rightists because he is not of their ethos and style. So as has been true with so many other phenomena, southern rightist radicalism will be essentially provincial. Its future will be determined by the rapidity with which the South becomes like the nation at large.

Dear Emory:

Enclosed is the covering letter and broad schedule for the Eastern ULEA.

I've made a reservation for you at Mt. Chateau for Thursday evening. Drop me a note on your air schedule and I'll arrange for transportation to Mt. Chateau.

There are 5 or 6 flights from Pittsburgh to Morgantown daily. It is also the least expensive.

I haven't nailed down Father Rice so far.

We'll cover expenses.

Fraternally,

Tapper

RE: FALL EASTERN ULEA MEETING IS ON IN MORGANTOWN --OCTOBER 2 - 4, 1969

My inquiry of June 25 produced only one negative response, one request for a slight adjustment in dates, one question and one suggestion for program. After some consultation with ULEA officers, the decision is to go forward with the meeting as proposed and as scheduled.

The program begins with a social at approximately 5:30 p.m. on Thursday evening to be followed by a dinner at approximately 7:30 p.m. (See tentative schedule attached.)

Morgantown is easy to reach by either air, bus or auto. Allegheny Airlines serves Morgantown on clear days with connections almost always at Pittsburgh or D. C. If driving from Pittsburgh, take I-79 to Waynesburg, Pa.--then Highway 19 South to Morgantown. If from the east--go to Uniontown, Pa.--then take Highway 119 South to Morgantown. If driving from the south, please obtain a good road map--or consult GREYHOUND.

After arriving in Morgantown, proceed to Mt. Chateau Lodge.

I'd be very pleased to obtain some indication from you concerning attendance. Please return the enclosed form.

THE PRESIDENT'S MEMORANDUM
OF MAY 2, 1963

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE FEBRUARY 26, 1966

Office of the White House Press Secretary

THE WHITE HOUSE

The President today announced the formation of a Council to the White House Conference, "To Fulfill These Rights." The Council, composed of a cross section of the nation's leadership, will devote evenings and weekends to preparations for the Conference first proposed by the President in his speech at Howard University in June, 1965. The Conference will be held in Washington June 1 and 2.

The President charged the Council, under the Chairmanship of Ben W. Heineman with the responsibility of sifting through the concepts, proposals, and programs outlined in the 1965 Planning Session and developing through their experience and knowledge a substantive agenda. It will be the task of the Council to consult with experts across the country; then develop programs for change to be presented to the Conference participants for their consideration and action.

In his speech at Howard University, the President announced he would call the Conference "to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally about to secure."

The Planning Session, held November 17 and 18, brought together approximately 250 scholars, leaders, and experts in civil rights problems from across the nation to consider some of the outstanding problems involved in bringing minority groups in this country from opportunity to achievement.

Mr. A. Philip Randolph is the Honorary Chairman of the Conference. The members of the Council will include:

Ben W. Heineman
Chairman of the Board
Chicago & Northwestern Railway Company

Morris Abram

Guaranteed Annual Income Urged

WASHINGTON — A Presidential commission on automation has recommended the launching of twin multi-billion dollar programs to create millions of public service jobs for the hard-core unemployed and to build a minimum income floor for all families.

The National Commission on Technology, Automation and Economic Progress offered a wide range of findings on the nature and pace of technological change and proposed steps to cope with the problem.

The 14-member panel called for national economic policies aimed at reducing the general unemployment rate to 3.5%, or below, by 1967. (The rate was 4.1% at the end of last year.)

An additional two years' free education either in community colleges or vocational schools for high-school graduates, elimination of financial obstacles to higher education and expanded opportunities for training and retraining were other recommendations of the commission.

The commission estimated that a total of 5.3 million jobs can be created to meet the huge backlog of public service needs. The job potentials were seen as 1.2 million in medical institutions; 1.3 million in national beautification programs; 700,000 in welfare and home care; 1.1 million in educational institutions; 350,000 in public protection and 650,000 in urban renewal and sanitation.

While concurring with the report, the three labor members and two others on the commission nevertheless criticized it for lacking "the sense of urgency" necessary in assessing the impact of automation.

The group, made up of Joseph A. Beirne, CWA president; Al Hayes, former president of IAM; Walter Reuther, UAW president; Anna Rosenberg Hoffman and Whitney M. Young, Jr., expressed the hope that the report would be taken as "an agenda for action."

The guaranteed minimum annual income for each American family would be accomplished through a "negative" income tax (a tax rebate or cash allowance) which would raise incomes to a specified level.

Noting that technology enlarges the capacities of man and extends his control over his environment, the commission urged that its benefits be spread to secure higher living standards, increased leisure, improved job environment and greater investment in human

Dear Sir:

Your Form 57 that was submitted to us as a Consultant to the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights" has been approved by the Civil Service Commission but in order for us to process your pay, it is necessary that an Oath of Office be taken.

It is suggested that you go to the Post Office in your community and take this Oath and have them forward it to Mrs. Carrie Gooding, Room 1122, General Services Administration Building, 18th and F Streets, N.W., Washington, D.C.

In the event this is not accomplished in your home community, any weekday that you happen to be in Washington, this Oath can be taken here. We would suggest, however, that you do this as soon as possible in order for us to process your pay.

Sincerely,

May 17, 1966

Dear Dr. Via:

You should have received by now an invitation from the President to participate in the White House Conference "To Fulfill These Rights", to be held Wednesday and Thursday, June 1 and 2, at the Sheraton-Park Hotel, Washington, D. C.

The President first proposed the Conference in June 1965 in his speech at Howard University. He announced that he would call the Conference "to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally about to secure." The President closed his speech with the prediction that "Together...we can light the candle of understanding in the heart of all America. And, once lit, it will never again go out."

The Conference will bring together a cross section of our society to consider action proposals.

Enclosed, for your convenience, is information regarding the location of the headquarters of the Conference, hotel accommodations, meals and registration. All hotel reservations for participants in the Conference will be arranged by the Conference staff. Please complete and promptly return to this office the enclosed self-addressed hotel reservation card.

I look forward to seeing you at the Conference.

Broader Integration Push?

* * * * * *

White House Conference Ideas Go Beyond Bans on Bias

By MONROE W. KARMIN

WASHINGTON—Some call it "pie-in-the sky" wishful thinking. Some call it a meaningless Presidential sop to liberals. Some call it a pertinent guide to the future. In part, the White House Conference on Civil Rights opening tomorrow fits each of these descriptions.

But, more than anything else, the headline-making confab serves as a yardstick by which to measure the progress of Johnson Administration racial policy. Conclusion: It stands at the edge of the great divide that separates anti-discrimination from pro-integration—with some evidence that the President may be ready to cross the bridge.

Perhaps the best definition of the Administration's current philosophical commitment is the parade of civil rights legislation of recent years. The justification offered for each new civil rights law, including the newest proposals to assure open housing and impartial justice, has been that the Negro's Constitutional rights require the dismantling of barriers that discriminate against him.

Now, as this week's conference makes clear, civil rights advocates want the Administration to proceed beyond battling discrimination to the adoption of a positive program to promote racial integration. Sums up one strategist: "We want the Federal Government to commit itself to racial integration as a goal."

The wishes of civil rights enthusiasts do not dictate Administration policy, of course. The White House conference is reporting to the President, not for him. And realists among the participants concede that, in today's fiscal and political climate, it would be impossible for Mr. Johnson to comply fully with their multi-billion-dollar, socially advanced desires.

Yet there is some confidence that the President may be willing to heed, as well as hear, their pleas, if only with a long-term gradual response. After all, it was he who summoned this week's conference with the proclamation that it is now time "to help the American Negro fulfill the rights which, after the long time of injustice, he is finally about to secure. To move beyond opportunity to achievement."

These words already have spurred some Federal agencies to a forward position. Unemployment is a prime example. Those officials who watch over hiring practices are not satisfied with businessmen who agree to eliminate racial barriers; they insist upon "affirmative action" to employ Negroes.

Major Restructuring of Society

But these are only tiny steps, in the view of the civil rights groups. What they want is a mammoth campaign; one that, when viewed in its entirety, would amount to a major restructuring of American society. The scope is so immense that even the mighty Federal Government is deemed incapable of the task without the full support of all major power groups.

That's what Ben W. Heineman, conference chairman, seeks when he calls for a "deeper involvement of all segments of American society"—business, labor, state and local governments, school boards, churches, and so on.
